The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the committee will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "resolved," and in lieu thereof to insert:

1. That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 9th of February, 1881, at 12 o'clock m., and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States; and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

2. That if it shall appear that any votes of electors for President or Vice-President of the United States have been given on a day other than that fixed for casting such votes by act of Congress in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States; if the counting or omitting to count such votes shall not essentially change the result of the election, they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner:

Were the votes of electors cast on the —— day of ——, 1880, to be counted, the result would be for A B for President of the United States —— votes, and for C D for President of the United States —— votes; if not counted the result would be for A B for President of the United States —— votes, and for C D for President of the United States —— votes, but in either event —— is elected President of the United States. And in the same manner for Vice-President.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My honorable friend from Alabama asks for the present consideration of that resolution. Inasmuch as my friend from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and myself, two members of the committee from whom the resolution has come, either were not invited or failed to get our invitations to a meeting last night, where I understand the amendment was agreed upon, we think we should like to see it in print before we commit ourselves either for or against it. I therefore ask that it go over and be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. THURMAN. Before the Senator from Vermont leaves the subject, I want to inquire what he means by speaking of a meeting last night? There was no meeting of this committee last night. He has been certainly invited to every meeting of the committee which has been held, and I think has been present at every meeting of the committee which has been held.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not say there was a meeting of the committee, but I said that my colleague from Colorado on the committee and myself either were not invited or failed to get our invitations to a meeting of some body; I will add now, if there is any misunderstanding of my remark, that I understood had been held last night, where this amendment, as I understood, had been agreed upon. That is what I said.

Mr. THURMAN. There was not only no formal meeting of this committee last night, but no meeting of the members of the committee.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SAUNDERS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2137) making appropriations for the improvement of the navigation of the Missouri River opposite the State of Nebraska and the State of Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BECK asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2138) for the relief of Harriet Ann Walker; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WITHERS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2139) to amend "An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes," approved June 16, 1880; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. EATON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 150) for the relief of Miss Eliza A. White; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. BUTLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the post-route bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONAS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CALENDAR OF HOUSE BILLS.

Mr. HARRIS. I call for the consideration at this time of the resolution submitted by me on the 25th of January. Let it be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. HARRIS on the 25th of January:

Resolved, That at the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of House bills which have been favorably reported, and continue such consideration until half past one o'clock; bills to be taken up in their order upon the Calendar; and this order shall commence immediately after the call for "concurrent and other resolutions."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to have this resolution prevent the operation of the rule of the Senate that authorizes the consideration of a resolution offered the day before, or some day before, and which under the present rules the Senator offering it or any other Senator has the right to have come before the Senate. I do not know of any resolution on the Calendar of resolutions that I wish to have come before the Senate at this time, or any other time; but I only speak of it as a precaution that we ought to take, because it may happen every day that some resolution of extreme public or technical importance in respect of the procedure of the Senate may be offered one day, objected to, and go over to the next. Under this order, which is peremptory, no Senator would have a right to do anything about it, and the Senate, until it rescinded this rule, would not have a right to do anything about it.

I think it is a wise thing, it strikes me so, that we should try as far as possible to expedite business by disposing of House bills as those most likely to become laws. Still, as there is a month yet, I do not know that we ought to exclude Senate bills entirely. Take Senate pension bills, take other Senate private bills, about which if they were taken up under the Anthony rule there would be no question whatever, and which still for a week or two might be sent to the House in time for its favorable action also. This proposed rule cuts out those.

Mr. HARRIS. I think not. The Senator will allow me to suggest that in the case of a resolution introduced to-day, even if this order shall be adopted, upon the call for "concurrent and other resolutions" to-morrow, if I understand the rules of the Senate, it would be perfectly competent for any Senator to call up a resolution introduced the day before, pending that call for "concurrent and other resolutions," and demand its consideration notwithstanding the adoption of the rule that is established by the resolution that I now ask the Senate to pass.

As to the consideration of Senate bills we ought to give preference to the consideration of bills that have passed the House and passed the ordeal of the consideration of a committee of this body and stand upon the Calendar. If we would legislate practically we certainly should give preference to the consideration of bills thus far advanced over the consideration of Senate bills remaining upon our Calendar at this late day, having after passing the Senate to go to the House and take their chances for consideration there. It is for these reasons that I insist upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I propose to modify my resolution by adding "subject to the rules governing the business of the morning hour," so that it will put the case of resolutions such as suggested by the Senator from Vermont beyond all question, so that a resolution can be considered under the call for "concurrent and other resolutions."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was the resolution reported from a committee, or is it a resolution of the Senator?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is a resolution introduced some days since by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He is entitled, then, to modify it, I suppose?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the modification is made accordingly?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That of course answers the difficulty that I suggested; but I would suggest, with great deference, that it may create another difficulty in the opposite direction in the broad language that it has. If it is subject to all the rules that govern business in the morning hour then the rules governing business in the morning hour authorize the Senator from Tennessee or any other Senator to move (after the call for resolutions and after any Senator has had his right to have a previous resolution laid before the Senate) to proceed to the consideration of any bill on the Calendar without regard to the question whether it is a Senate bill or a House bill. One rule of the Senate as it now stands is what is called the Anthony rule. That rule provides for a different order of procedure. If this resolution as now modified is subject to all the rules and orders of the Senate it might be claimed by somebody that that would apply. Although I should not vote that way myself, because I should take the evident intent of it rather than the mere legal construction to guide me in voting about it, still it might lead to debate and dispute.

But now to come to the main real point that my friend from Tennessee has, and I think wisely, in view, if this is the right point of time to have it go into effect, the case is this: We have twenty-seven or twenty-eight or thirty days, something like that, yet left of this session. It is desirable in justice to all parties, saying nothing now about general public interests, that any claims of justice and fairness that exist in favor of private suitors (if I may use such a phrase, and I believe it is a correct one) should be heard and considered by this great court of the nation. My friend from Tennessee thinks we ought to begin to consider a particular class of those, that is to say, those that have come from the House. At a certain stage in the session which the joint rules, when they were in force, provided for, that was fixed practically or by consequence as the last three days of the session, because those joint rules prohibited the sending of new bills from either House to the other during that time; and therefore it would be entirely useless to take up and consider here a Senate bill during that time, because it could not be sent to the House of Representatives; but this proposes to do this thing in effect thirty days before the end of Congress, or twenty-six or twenty-seven working days before.

I only call attention to it, because I do not belong to the responsible majority in controlling the business of the Senate, but I do think, with great deference, that it would be wiser, (and I propose it for the consideration of my friend from Tennessee, with whose object I entirely sympathize,) to go on vigorously and fairly under the Anthony rule, take up unobjected cases on the Calendar, and have it understood as far as we can, without any binding obligation except that of good sense, that if any Senator thinks a bill needs considerable consideration before it shall be disposed of either way, let him object early, in the beginning, so as to save time and run off from our Calendar those cases that command the assent of nine-tenths, if not the unanimous assent of this body. If I were to fix it myself I would go on for four or five days exclusively with Senate bills, of the character referred to in the Anthony rule, which is intended to cover the small cases of poor and defenseless people who have not any strong influences to back them, yet whose claims committees report are those that are entitled to the justice, and of course the speedy justice, of the Government. Having run through those we could send them over to the House in the hope that on the strength of the opinion of the Senate committee as to facts the House of Representatives might be able to take the largest part of them from the Speaker's table—if I do not violate any rule in merely speaking of processes, and I doubt if I do, I do not mean to, certainly—and dispose of them. Then inasmuch as most of the House bills would not require to be sent back at all, even for amendment probably, take up the House bills in the way my friend from Tennessee proposes. I do not make any motion; I only suggest it with deference to the consideration of gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. HARRIS. Being satisfied as I am that at this late day of the session there is not a remote probability that one bill in five hundred that we may send to the House at this day would find consideration there and be finally acted upon, my resolution simply proposes to appropriate that amount of time between finishing the legitimate morning business of every morning up to one and half o'clock to the consideration of House bills on the Calendar, and even though we may have twenty-five, twenty-six, or twenty-seven working days yet remaining, I doubt very much whether, if every moment of the time that my resolution proposes to appropriate should be devoted to the consideration of House bills on the Calendar favorably reported, we should be able to more than consider, if indeed we should be able to consider within that time, those bills that have reached that advanced stage of consideration and action.

I therefore think that the better policy is to adopt the resolution and devote the time that it appropriates to the consideration of House bills. I shall therefore ask the judgment of the Senate upon it. Of course I shall yield with perfect satisfaction to whatever may be the judgment of the Senate in that respect.

Mr. WHYTE. I propose to offer an amendment, which is to strike out the words "which have been favorably reported." There are some six or seven House bills on the Calendar which have not been favorably reported, and yet have been passed almost unanimously by the House. I think it would be very hard if those bills cannot have a hearing, when perchance they may not have been favorably reported through the action of one single person in a committee. I think that those bills ought to have the same chance of a favorable action in the body of the Senate as those that have been favorably reported. If the Anthony rule, so far as the limitation of five minutes to each member in the discussion of the various bills, is also adopted with this resolution, there can be no trouble in disposing of those bills which were adversely reported when considering those favorably reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the words "which have been favorably reported;" so that the resolution will read:

> That at the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of House bills, and continue such considerations until half past one o'clock, &c.

Mr. VOORHEES. I only want to add my hearty concurrence to this resolution, whether amended or unamended, as proposed by the Senator from Tennessee. We hear great complaint, as the session is drawing to a close, of leaving Calendar business undisposed of. The Calendar contains the labor of the committees of both branches of Congress; and looking over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this morning—for I was absent a little while yesterday evening—I observed the struggle which is already being made for precedence in business here before the Senate. I think the best way to settle that question is to take up the Calendar and do the business that it contains as it is there presented, and stick to it.

The proposition made by the Senator from Tennessee, as I understand it, is to utilize a portion of the morning hour in this praiseworthy enterprise, after transacting the morning business to proceed directly to the Calendar and stick to it until the morning hour expires, subject, of course, to the order of the Senate. I am very much impressed with the necessity of some rule of this kind, and I am very glad that the Senator from Tennessee has brought it forward, because I thought something of doing so myself. There are some bills on the Calendar that are calling for action very loudly. I had intended, for instance, to-day at the close of the morning hour to ask the Senate to proceed to consider the bill reported by the Joint Select Committee on additional accommodations for the Library of Congress; but I cannot antagonize the pension appropriation bill, which I understand will be called up by the Senator from California, [Mr. BOOTH.] But there is no measure outside of the supply of money to carry on the machinery of the Government more important than this library question, and I shall ask at a very early day that it be considered. It is on the Calendar; it ought to have a chance.

I hope the Senate will adopt the resolution offered by the Senator from Tennessee, perhaps with the modification suggested by the Senator from Maryland. I think the best way would be to take up the bills sent here by the House that are on the Calendar. There is here and there a bill on the Calendar with an adverse report, and let it have its chance and be considered. I am willing for my part to favor an occasional night session for the consideration, for instance, of business relating to pensions, or something of that kind.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am disposed to concur in a good deal that has been said by the Senator from Vermont, and I think it is a little premature to take up this resolution now. Justice has not been done to the Calendar at all, and I do not think we ought to discriminate between cases at this day. I think that a week at least ought to be given to consider the Senate bills that are there, so that the House may have an opportunity of meeting us in a reciprocal spirit and passing some of our bills. Now, to take up the House bills at this time and devote the remaining portion of the session exclusively to them, I think would be eminently unjust.

Mr. HARRIS. In the morning hour only.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. In the morning hour. That is the only hour we have. There are a great many Senate bills on the Calendar just as meritorious as any that came from the House, and if we were to devote a week to the consideration of our own bills, and after that take up the House bills, it would be very well, and then let the House meet us in an equal spirit of justice and pass on some of our bills.

Mr. HOAR. I think if the Senate will glance at the Calendar and see what the House bills are which are upon it—there are some sixteen or twenty in all in number—they will be satisfied that there is no reason whatever for giving these bills from their character and importance the preference in the last days of the session.

Mr. BURNSIDE. There are fifty-two House bills on the Calendar now.

Mr. HOAR. The number which I named applies to those reported favorably, which are all that the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee applies to.

Mr. BURNSIDE. There are fifty reported favorably and only two unfavorably.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator must be mistaken. I think there are not more than sixteen or twenty.

Mr. HARRIS. There are only twenty-odd bills from the House on the Calendar reported favorably. The Senator from Massachusetts is right.

Mr. HOAR. In a hasty running over the Calendar I found only sixteen, not counting House resolutions but only House bills. Those bills are not bills as a general rule it seems to me, if Senators will look at the Calendar, which they will consider of public importance enough to give to them the precious hours which remain of the session in preference to a great many other matters which stand on the Calendar and which have been matured and perfected in the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire, after the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland is acted on, to move an amendment to the resolution by inserting "and Senate bills" after "House," so as to read "House and Senate bills."

It strikes me, although the time is very short, that if we expect to get through with legislation at all, the important bills which have been reported in the Senate ought to be acted on. We ought to devote some little time to the business of our own body. I desire to know what is the use of committees of the Senate meeting every morning and reporting bills to go to the Calendar, and then resolve that we will take up nothing but House bills in the morning hour, thus depriving ourselves of the opportunity of acting on bills of very great importance to our constituents and some of them of general character and importance to the whole country that stand here upon the Calendar. It strikes me that to change this rule now so as to act exclusively on bills from one House only, is rather changing the character of legislation in such a way as has not been done heretofore; and certainly it will be of no advantage and it will not advance the interests of the country to any considerable extent. If the bills that pass the Senate are to go to the House merely to lie on their table and not be acted on at all, and bills that come from the House are here to have priority over all other bills, we had just as well let one house do the legislation for the country, and let us sit here and act only on the bills sent to us. That will be the result of it, I think.

I cannot see for the life of me any reason for this thing. I think we ought to go on as we usually have done, occupying the morning hour with such matters as are proper and as the Senate may agree to take up and act on, and then proceed with the regular order of the day; but if we take up the Calendar at all let us not make an exception. Let us take the whole Calendar if we are to take it at all. I shall propose that amendment if this resolution is to be adopted that we shall go on with the Calendar as we come to the cases by their numbers, Senate and House bills both.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I do not think this resolution ought to be adopted at this time. It may be opportune at a later day in the session. It will be distinctly remembered that at the close of the last session, at the instance of the Senator from Tennessee, we laid aside the Senate Calendar and gave preference to the House bills, and went through with the Calendar of House bills which had been reported from our committees, to the exclusion of the Senate bills. I hold in my hand the House Calendar for Friday, January 21, 1881; I supposed it was the last Calendar. I called for the last, and I supposed there was no later Calendar. This shows that business passed by the Senate May 27, 1880, is upon the Speaker's table. In other words, the bills considered at the last session by the Senate and sent to the House have not even been taken from the Speaker's table.

If we adopt this resolution now, we simply exclude from our consideration all our own business and devote ourselves exclusively to the consideration of House bills. We were calling the Calendar in its regular order at the last session when the Senator from Tennessee made this motion. I joined him then in sustaining the motion because I thought it was right and proper, and would facilitate the business of the Senate. Now, if the Senate will confine itself to the consideration of the Calendar business for a week or ten days, and we have not reached the House cases on the Calendar, I will then cordially join the Senator from Tennessee in taking up and considering the House cases. I think it is right and fair and just, but I do think that it is premature now and too early to insist on the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired. The resolution goes over. The Chair will lay before the Senate some House bills for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4874) in relation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

The bill (H. R. No. 7098) making an appropriation for the flooring of the National Museum was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded, being the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the Anthony rule. For what purpose does the Senator from California rise?

Mr. FARLEY. I rose for the purpose of making a motion to take from the Calendar, postponing the pending order temporarily, the bill (S. No. 1210) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy. I will state the reasons that prompt me to make this motion now.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. FARLEY. Certainly.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yesterday I gave notice that to-day, during the morning hour, I should desire to submit to the Senate a few remarks in reply to something that was said yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] I supposed until just now that the morning hour ran until half past one o'clock, and therefore I did not interpose. I think I shall not consume more than fifteen minutes.

Mr. FARLEY. I will state to the Senator from Iowa that this bill is of considerable importance. It has already passed the Senate, was reconsidered and referred to the committee, and reported back again.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. There will be time enough left to get it up.

Mr. FARLEY. My own opinion is that it will take but a few minutes to dispose of it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should be glad to say what I have to say, and then I will join the Senator in getting up the bill if possible.

Mr. FARLEY. If I thought the bill would not be antagonized, as a matter of course I would yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I believe it is customary when a notice has been given of the intention of a Senator to say something to allow him that privilege.

Mr. FARLEY. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to call up a motion to reconsider, which I suppose will be disposed of in a minute. If it is not I shall yield at once. The other day I moved a reconsideration of the vote whereby the Senate refused to pass the bill (S. No. 2054) to remove the political disabilities of Richard Fatherly, of Arkansas, the objection being made to the form of the petition, an objection which I originally made.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Is it proposed to pass the bill now, or merely to enter the motion to reconsider?

Mr. HOAR. I have entered the motion already.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I would rather go on.

Mr. HOAR. I am informed that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] now has a petition in three lines which seems to me to be in proper form, and I desire to ask that the vote rejecting the bill be reconsidered and the bill passed.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I would prefer to go on. If it is my privilege to go on, I insist on it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

KILLING OF BIG SNAKE.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. What I intend to say to-day might well have been said yesterday in a very few minutes, but I did not desire to interfere with the regular order of business of the Senate, and therefore deferred my remarks until to-day.

The Senator from Massachusetts who spoke yesterday [Mr. DAWES] evidenced a very laudable desire to protect the honor and good name of our Government, claiming, as I understood him, that the preservation of its honor and good name required an acknowledgment by it of wrong whenever wrong had been done and reparation for it when it could be made. I concur in that view very heartily. I do not think there is any better test of true honor, either among nations or men, than the acknowledgment of wrong when wrong has been done, and a reparation of that wrong so far as it is in the power of the wrong-doer to make reparation. I believe that; but I do not think it is necessary for an individual or any of the Departments of the Government to be anxious to find blots upon its good name and fame and to exercise ingenuity and argument to prove that it has been doing wrong.

It was claimed yesterday, as I understood the Senator from Massachusetts, that there were two things especially reprehensible in regard to the conduct of the Government toward the Ponca tribe of Indians. It was alleged that one of the high officers of our Government, the Secretary of the Interior, had forgotten to answer a resolution passed by this body asking information in regard to that matter, and I think it was inferred that the forgetfulness was not real forgetfulness, but an intentional withholding of the information desired by the Senate. After having had read the resolution of inquiry and stated the failure of the Secretary to answer it, the Senator said:

> But the Secretary states that the answer had been already placed in the hands of the committee who instituted this inquiry, and his Commissioner of Indian Affairs not only fixes the date some nine months since, but more than intimates that the papers had been purposely lost by that committee, though they were ostensibly still seeking the information.

Now, I do not understand that either the Secretary or his Commissioner so stated. The letter of the Secretary dated the 5th of last month states briefly, without any explanation other than by reference to the letter of his Commissioner, why the answer did not reach the Senate; and the Commissioner states this:

> I have the honor to state that by reference to the records of this office it appears that copies of all the papers referred to were made and furnished on the 18th of March last.

Not furnished to the Senate, but furnished to the proper officers in the Interior Department.

> And as Mr. Brooks, who was then chief clerk of the office, was frequently called as a witness before the committee of the Senate charged with investigating the affairs of the Poncas during that month, it is supposed that he informally took the papers to the committee-room pending the investigation.

And then it goes on and states that, as they cannot be found, he sends copies of them again. There is no intimation in that, I think, that the papers had been sent by the Commissioner to the committee and by the committee intentionally lost. It states the mere naked fact as it appeared to the Commissioner and to the Secretary at the time.

Further with reference to that, I find in the testimony before our committee last March of the chief clerk of the Indian Bureau, at that time acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, this question and answer:

> Q. Were you requested to furnish the committee with copies of any papers that might be in the Indian Office bearing upon the killing of Big Snake?
> A. I was; and I have them here.
> Q. Do they contain anything additional to what has already been testified to before the committee?
> A. Really, my time has been so fully occupied that I have not had time to examine them, and cannot say whether they contain anything additional or not.

It is evident that all that is material of these papers was in the possession of the committee, because in the report of the committee itself are contained the letter of the agent in the Indian Territory asking the arrest of this Indian, and the report of himself and the report of the officer by whom the arrest was attempted, in which attempt the Indian was killed. Those were left with the committee, and are printed in and with the report of the committee made at the last session of Congress.

By examination it will be found that the resolution passed the Senate on the 11th day of March, and this testimony was given by Mr. Brooks before the committee on the 20th day of March, when he brought with him to the committee-room the papers that contained all the information of any value touching this transaction. Besides they had before that committee the testimony of two or three Indians who were present when the occurrence took place, and who gave, in addition to the official information we had there, oral testimony upon the same subject. I do not believe that the Secretary of the Interior designed to withhold from this committee or from the Senate any information whatever upon this subject, but that the matter was wholly inadvertent on his part.

When a resolution goes to the head of one of our Departments, as I understand, the order of proceeding is something like this: it is sent by the Secretary to the chief of the bureau in which the information may be expected to be had, and it is referred by him to one of his subordinates to furnish it. The papers are made out by the subordinate and laid before the chief of the bureau, forwarded to the Secretary, and by the Secretary to the Senate; and each one of these preserves a record of what has been done. The record of the Interior Department shows that this resolution was received, referred to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and by him to the proper officer to prepare the information. By that officer the information was given to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and there the record stops. It never went into the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, and I have no doubt that the suggestion of the Secretary, made in his reply to the resolution at this session, is the literal truth, that by inadvertence the papers which were intended to be sent to the Senate were carried by the Commissioner as a witness to the special committee and left with that committee.

Another thing, Mr. President. The killing of Big Snake has been characterized in very severe terms as a cowardly murder, and I am not sure but that persons reading the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts would understand from them that it was a premeditated, planned, pre-arranged murder. What are the facts in regard to it? Big Snake may have been or may not have been the hero that the Senator from Massachusetts has portrayed him to be. I shall not go into that. He was undoubtedly in the Indian Territory, at the agency there, what may be properly called insubordinate. It has been for a long time—how long I do not know—a rule based upon law, perhaps, (I am not sure whether it is so or not,) that Indians cannot leave their reservation without permission of the agent there. Indians cannot go into a reservation not their own without permission of the agent, and white men cannot do the same thing. It has been believed for a long time that these rules and regulations were necessary for the proper management and control of Indians on reservations.

Big Snake had applied to the agent for leave to go with his family, and perhaps some other Indians, to the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation near Fort Reno, and for reasons that were good, I presume, that permission had been refused. Then in violation of the rule, in contempt of the authority of the agent, he went; and that was not the only time he had done the same thing in other directions. He placed himself there on that reservation in defiance of the authority of the agent, and again and again, in violation of the rules of the agency, of the rules of the Department, he left the reservation at his pleasure. Upon one occasion, when going to the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation, the agent sent an express messenger with information that a band of Indians were coming, and asked that they be arrested when they reached that reservation, and they were arrested, some fifty or sixty of them. In two or three days all but Big Snake and two others were released and allowed to go home, but they were kept some two or three months, when they were also released. Big Snake came back to the Ponca reservation and remained there, as the agent says, sullen and disposed to make the other Indians insubordinate, and, as the agent says, so acting toward him as to make him believe that his (the agent's) life was in danger. The Senator from Massachusetts says that is a mere pretense, and the pretense of a coward at that. That may be true; I do not know; but I am not willing to make against a man without knowledge the charge that he is either a coward or pretender.

It has been known for a long time to Congress, I apprehend, that our Indian agents and our Indian department have the rules and regulations of which I speak, and which this Indian had again and again violated, and defiantly violated. Congress knew of the existence of these rules and regulations, I apprehend. If they were wrong, why did not Congress repeal them or by law provide that such rules and regulations should not be enforced? They did not do so, and the rules and regulations continued for year after year, for many years, as the rules by which reservations were to be governed, and Congress acquiesced in their continuance.

I wish to read very briefly from the testimony of Standing Buffalo, one of these same Ponca Indians examined before our committee at that time. It is at page 233. He applied for permission to go, and was refused:

Q. Did you get the permission of the agent to go, or did you ask it?
A. We asked permission of the agent, but he would not give it; we asked him for a pass, too.
Q. What did you say to the agent when he refused to give you permission to go?
A. The agent told us that he would send word and ask the Government; but the Poncas did not wait for an answer, and one of the chiefs started; then the rest of them followed him.

This agent was doing his duty as an agent; when application was made for permission to go he thought it ought not to be given and refused to give it, but said to the Indians, "I will send word and ask the Government"—meaning thereby the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, I apprehend—"whether I should give this permission or not;" but the Indians, under the lead of the man who was killed, were determined to go, and went, defying the authority of the agent, defying the rules and regulations pertaining in the Indian agencies, as I understand, and which have received at least tacitly the approval of Congress by not having been repealed.

The agent, after the return of Big Snake, after he appeared among the tribe again for some time, believing his presence there to be injurious to the peace and quietness of the tribe, asked to have him arrested, and orders were sent to that end, and a lieutenant with a squad of men was sent from Fort Reno to the Ponca agency to arrest him. It was said by the Senator from Massachusetts that "the cowardly agent beguiled Big Snake into his office under a promise of the payment of money due, and then ordered the soldiers already there to take him away."

The Senator has allowed his feelings to run away with his judgment in this matter. The evidence shows, I think incontestably, that when the officer arrived there with the soldiers he went, as his duty was, to the agent to report his presence and was informed that Big Snake was expected at the agency at a certain time on that day to receive some money that was due to him, and he (the agent) thought it would be better for the officer to wait until he came and then make the arrest. That is the "beguilement," as I understand the testimony, and the only beguilement there was in regard to it. When the Indian came, the officer came and had him told that he was there for the purpose of arresting him. He refused to be arrested, declaring, according to the testimony of an Indian who gave testimony in that regard—Esan—that he would rather die than be arrested and taken back again to Fort Reno. He was a powerful man, extraordinarily so, and when in obedience to the orders of the lieutenant the soldiers went to him to arrest him, he resisted. They took hold of him. He shook them off. They tried to put handcuffs upon him and were unable to do so. There was a general melee and scramble; the soldiers tried to overpower him and he resisted. He was struck twice with a gun and eventually was shot. It is claimed by the soldiers who shot him that they were afraid of the use of a weapon by him; it is claimed on the other hand that he was unarmed, that he had no knife, and I believe that claim is correct; but the soldiers did not know that. One of them, the corporal of the squad, knew the Indian well and considered him a dangerous man, and in the strife, fearing that some of them might be injured, the man was unfortunately shot. Of that occurrence and the final unfortunate ending of it the Senator said:

The struggle continued with doubtful odds until a soldier from a position prearranged for the purpose put an end to it by a ball which pierced the brain of the victim.

Now, whether the Senator desired to be understood as wishing to convey the impression that this had been a pre-arranged plan beforehand to kill the man, that this soldier had been stationed there for the purpose, and that the struggle was a pretense to give him the opportunity of doing it, I do not know. If that were the intention of the Senator from Massachusetts, I can say that he was mistaken; he was mistaken in the facts; and that again he has allowed his feelings in this matter to becloud his judgment.

I have said all, Mr. President, that I desire to say in regard to these two matters. There is another matter to which I will refer very briefly. I am not at all in the habit of noticing what may appear in the newspapers with regard to myself individually, but in the National Republican of yesterday morning there is what purports to be an interview between a reporter of that paper and the Senator from Massachusetts, in which certain language is used that may perhaps refer to myself, not individually, but somewhat in a representative character. After speaking of what occurred at the last meeting of the special committee on Ponca affairs, this language is used, apparently by the Senator from Massachusetts:

All I desire to add is that the whole proceeding was something entirely outside of all my previous experience of the conduct of congressional committee investigations or of tolerated treatment of witnesses.

Senators may know that I have the honor of being chairman of that committee, and I can scarcely believe that the Senator from Massachusetts designed to reflect upon my conduct as such; and yet the language, it appears to me, is susceptible of precisely that construction. Let me say a word about that examination.

Two theories have obtained in regard to the signing of a certain paper by the chiefs of the Ponca tribe of Indians during the month of December in this city. One theory was and is that the Indians were brought here by the Secretary of the Interior for the purpose of procuring from them some such paper; that when they got here, either by intimidation or bribery the chiefs were induced to sign that paper. That is one theory. The other theory is that the Ponca tribe of Indians held consultations together in the Territory as long ago as October last, and concluded, after reviewing all the circumstances attending their surroundings there, that it would be better for them to remain in that Territory, and they instructed their chiefs to write to the Secretary of the Interior asking permission to come for the purpose of carrying that intention into effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) If the Senator will suspend, the Chair will lay before the Senate——

Mr. ALLISON. I hope my colleague will be allowed to proceed and conclude.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business had, perhaps, better be laid before the Senate, and then it can be informally laid aside. The hour of half past one having arrived, the Chair will lay before the Senate its unfinished business, which is Senate bill No. 1773. There being no objection, the bill will be temporarily laid aside to allow the Senator from Iowa to conclude his remarks.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. In accordance, then, with the written request of the Ponca tribe in October last the chiefs came here, and when here, according to the second theory that I have mentioned, without solicitation, without intimidation, without bribery, of their own free will, as the representatives of their tribe, they carried into effect the purpose for which they were sent here; they did the thing they were sent here to do.

Now, there is a wide difference between these two statements of how that thing was done. If one statement be the true one, then the Secretary of the Interior has done a very base and dishonorable thing. If the other statement be the true one, he has not so done. When he read what purported to be extracts from the report made by the commission recently sent there to inquire, I suppose, in regard to that particular matter, he understood the report to carry with it at least an inference that the theory which, if true, imparts to him dishonor and baseness was the true theory, and naturally he would feel, if he were innocent of it, that that should have some explanation, and he therefore requested that these commissioners should be called before the special committee and that matter inquired into. My own judgment was that they should come before the committee, not wholly in regard to that particular transaction, but for the purpose of learning from them, outside of anything they might have communicated in their formal report, all the information that could be had from them touching the very truth of the matter as to the condition of these Indians in the Territory, and therefore I notified the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Alabama that there would be a meeting of the committee held for this purpose, and we met and had an examination. What the result of that examination was I shall not now take time to remark upon.

I have but this to say further, Mr. President, and then I shall relieve the Senate: I may not know how to conduct an investigation by a Senate committee. I have labored under the impression that the purpose of an investigation was to arrive at the exact truth in regard to the matter investigated, and not to give color or strength to any particular side of it; that the purpose of a committee was to do what a witness is sworn to do, to get the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. I think I have the right to claim for myself that during this investigation I have tried to be not an advocate but a judge; that I have tried to produce no particular result, but to prepare for the use of the Senate every possible information that could be had, so that when the time comes for them to judge they may judge dispassionately and fairly what is the right thing to do.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment. The Senator from Iowa, in the conclusion of his remarks, referred to a matter that he deemed personal to himself, for which I am very much obliged to him, because it gives me the opportunity to say in public what I assured him in private the moment he showed me the article from which he read, that my regard and esteem for the Senator is profound and sincere, and that I neither entertained nor desired to convey the idea that I had ever known anything in his official life that I could take exception to. This I assured him in private, and I am glad he has given me an opportunity to repeat it in public.

What I meant to say in the paragraph which he has read, as I told him in private, was this: when I came into the committee-room, upon invitation of its chairman, I found a Cabinet officer, with a stenographer, cross-examining a commission appointed by the President who had made the report of their doings to the President himself, and which report had not been made public except as extracts of it had appeared in the papers. The manner in which that cross-examination was conducted was what I referred to; the fact that it was continued until the members of the committee were compelled to hurry up into the Chamber here to cast their votes, and before the examination of the witness had been concluded, and that afterward without any knowledge of the committee what had been thus far testified by the witness under these extraordinary circumstances was furnished by that officer in culled extracts to the Associated Press and sent abroad over the land without the knowledge or permission of the committee, and had been so presented as according to my recollection very much failed to fairly represent the testimony that had been given up to that time. That transaction I characterized—not anything that my distinguished chairman had done, but that transaction I characterized in these words:

> All I desire to add is that the whole proceeding was something entirely outside of all my previous experience of the conduct of congressional committee investigations or of tolerated treatment of witnesses.

I regret that it was said in any such way that the Senator should apply it to himself. I do not regret that I expressed this sentiment. I believe it to be true. I know that I never observed any such thing before, and that was all I stated. Whether it is the ordinary way of transacting investigations in other committees, of which I have no knowledge, other committees will testify.

I stand here and everywhere to say that in this long examination the Senator from Iowa has done, according to my opinion, just what he stated here he thought was his duty, and sought faithfully for the truth and for nothing else.

The Senator complains of the spirit in which I addressed the Senate yesterday, and says that my zeal has run away with my judgment. That may be. I do not assume to say that I am better able to master and control my emotions than any other Senator; but if I go down into history with no other charge laid to my door than that sometimes, when I had seen what I thought was an outrage committed on a fellow being, I struggled more than was thought wise by cooler temperaments to get an expression of opinion from officials under whose authority that outrage had been committed that would serve in history as a condemnation of it, I shall not trouble myself to answer any such accusation as that.

The Senator says that I conveyed the idea that I charged the Secretary with intentionally withholding papers and with accusing the committee of intentionally losing them, and at the same time inquiring for them. Why, Mr. President, the Secretary forgets and my distinguished colleague on the committee overlooks the fact that the committee on the Ponca investigation was one thing, this inquiry was another thing addressed to the Secretary by the Senate, not even originating with the committee. It was a resolution introduced into the Senate, it is true, by a Senator who happened to be upon that committee, and he stated honestly yesterday in his speech that it was suggested by documents which came into the possession of the committee, and those were the documents that my friend the Senator from Iowa has alluded to. It was in the course of the investigations of that committee that the documents now alluded to by the Senator from Iowa and published in the report of the committee by myself who made that report, suggested to a Senator in his seat here discharging his duty as a Senator, the offering of a resolution, and the Senate adopted it, calling upon the Secretary to sumbit to the Senate——

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Do not forget that was the 11th of March, and the testimony from which I have read was taken on the 20th.

Mr. DAWES. No, I do not forget it. The resolution was addressed to the Secretary of the Interior, requiring him to communicate to the Senate several things; one was all documents, all communications, all correspondence, all in his Department touching this matter. We had before us certain documents. We could not believe that they were all. We could not find among them, and you do not find to-day among them, the document by which the Secretary of the Interior requested the Army to fulfill the order emanating from his Indian agent to arrest and confine for his natural life this Indian. That communication is not here to-day. How the Army in the laudable and proper discharge of its duty was set in motion by the Interior Department to do this is lacking in these papers to-day. I wanted, and I offered the resolution calling for, all the papers. I wanted to see whether the Secretary of the Interior did respond without question to a request of his Indian agent to send soldiers there to commit this man to a dungeon for his natural life, and I have not got it yet. That was one thing.

Another thing that we called for which has not come was what action the Interior Department took over the result, which was the dead chief left dead and unburied where they shot him, until his relatives came in at night and carried his body off. That was another thing; and the third and most important thing was whether the Interior Department approved or condemned this work. That did not come.

Sir, I never thought for a moment, I do not think now, that the Interior Department intentionally withheld these papers; I have never said it did. I did say yesterday that such inadvertences in the press of business might well occur, and of themselves they ought not to be the subject of criticism; but after all this delay, instead of the usual course of a resolution here calling upon the Secretary for his reasons for failing to answer, there was a private note that called his attention to it. After all that, I did think that he might omit to intimate that it was the committee, and not he, at whose door, if there was fault, it should be laid. That is all about that.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will the Senator allow me to make a remark?

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator from Massachusetts is through, will it be in order to call for the regular order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It certainly would be.

Mr. DAWES. I am not through.

Mr. INGALLS. I beg pardon.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I wish to have appear what does not appear, as it has some bearing upon the action of this agent, a question to Esau the Indian and the answer to it on page 249:

> Q. Did you hear any one order the soldier to fire?
> A. No, sir; but as they were trying to put the handcuffs on Big Snake the agent told the soldiers not to fire. I heard that.

I think the remarks of the Senator yesterday would not lead any one to expect that that testimony had been given.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think they would have led the Senate to believe that it was testified to or not testified to. I was coming to the matter of the character of Big Snake first. It has been intimated that there was some ground for fear of him and that he was an ugly and bad Indian. The testimony in this book that the Senator and I have enjoyed the privilege of carrying about for a year is ample and full to the genuine and true and noble character of that Indian, and although he be an Indian he is entitled to defense. In this book is the testimony of the great chief of that tribe, White Eagle, who tells his story about this whole transaction; how he came in the morning and saw these soldiers and apprehended that there was trouble brewing somewhere; not mistrusting that any one more than another of his devoted tribe was to be visited with the vengeance that comes in the form of authority sometimes, but believing there was some trouble, he made an excuse that he had lost a pony and got leave of the agent to go off and hunt him up. He came back at night and was told by his children that in his absence his associate chief had been shot in the office of the Indian agent and lay there weltering in his blood. At that time he went to the Indian agent, and I beg to read what was the conversation between them.

Mr. COKE. I do not like to interfere with the Senator from Massachusetts, but——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas addresses the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. COKE. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts how much longer this discussion is likely to continue?

Mr. DAWES. Well, Mr. President, if that is an intimation on the part of the Senator from Texas that he does not think it worth while for me to occupy any more attention, I will say to him that while I do not intend to consume time unnecessarily, and regret very much that this matter is forced upon the Senate, I desire to call attention to the fact that I have not taxed the time of the Senate on the Indian question till yesterday. Perhaps other Senators may have consumed more time. I do not know how that is.

Mr. COKE. I do not know what the Senator says.

Mr. DAWES. This is what I wish to read to the Senate from White Eagle's testimony:

> Q. Did the agent tell you why the soldiers had come there to take off Big Snake? Did he tell you what Big Snake had done, that the soldiers were going to take him off?
> A. He told me that since Big Snake had come back he would not go to his house.
> Q. To whose house—the agent's house?
> A. Yes, sir; and he thought that Big Snake ought to go there and see him; he thought that Big Snake hated him.

Q. Was the agent afraid of Big Snake?
A. I told the agent that I was with Big Snake all the time. I said, "I never heard him say that he hated you." I told the agent that Big Snake did not go to see him because they had had a few words before Big Snake went to visit that other tribe and was arrested. I told him that Indians when they have a few words between each other do not talk to each other for a good while.
Q. Did the agent say that he was afraid that Big Snake was going to hurt him?
A. I said to the agent that if I knew that Big Snake hated [illegible] told him so.
Q. What did he say to that?
A. He told me that Big Snake did not come to see him, and and so he thought that Big Snake hated him, and that he wo some time.
Q. Did he tell you that the Government had authorized there to take off Big Snake?
A. He told me that he wrote to one of the head men, one o of the Ponca Indians hated him, and he was afraid of hin sent soldiers to inquire into the matter.
Q. Did he say that those soldiers had come there to inquir
A. I do not know whether they inquired or not. I told th asked me I would have told him how Big Snake felt. Big S go and see the agent, because he had arrested Big Snake an for nothing. Big Snake asked me to go and ask the agent he was ashamed to go and ask favors of the agent himself af him in jail.

I told them that although we felt v was killed, yet if we do not do anything bad some good p wrong when they hear about it.

Now, sir, a single word about the character of not from myself but from another. The Senator PLUMB] complained of me yesterday that I chara as a coward. I did not characterize him as a c words of another. He was characterized as a co took the words of the officials who are being de not my own, and I will now read them. Mr. In whom I alluded yesterday, was sent down into t to look up this man's accounts, as I stated yesterd there he made a thorough investigation of the kil because it was in the way of everything else, an he says:

Q. Did the killing of Big Snake have anything to do with agent?
A. No, sir; that was not a point in question.
Q. Were you instructed by the Department to inquire i attending the killing of Big Snake?
A. No, sir; that matter was not specifically mentioned.
Q. You say that you have no doubt the agent was afraid inquire among the Indians to ascertain whether he had any this fear?
A. I talked the matter over generally with both Indians a of the opinion that the killing of Big Snake, like the remov Dakota, was an unfortunate mistake.
Q. You think it grew out of the fact that the agent was afraid [illegible]
A. Yes, sir; after his return from Fort Reno, he had very little dealings with the agent; he imagined that he had been wronged by the agent, and he felt it very keenly. Indians, as a general rule, prefer death to confinement—what they call "going to the guard-house." And after Big Snake returned from his confinement, when he saw the agent, from time to time, he would point at him and remark, "Pe-azh."
Q. Is that a term of reproach?
A. Yes, sir; it means "mean" or "bad." That was about all that passed between the two after Big Snake's return from Fort Reno.

This Indian agent, in order to restore order among these Indians, after a writ of habeas corpus had delivered this chief's brother, had caused him to be incarcerated from the 18th day of May until the 4th day of August, which the Senator from Iowa, in front of me [Mr. ALLISON] thought meant an immediate release of all but three.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. DAWES. Now, do not interrupt me.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but——

Mr. DAWES. And the Senator said that the Interior Department ordered all those Indians released immediately with the exception of three. This was one of the three who was kept there from the 18th day of May until the 4th of August without cause, and he had the hardihood to say that the man who did it was mean, and that was all, and for that he lost his life.

Q. Did you investigate the question whether Big Snake had really threatened the life of the agent or not?
A. That is a disputed point; I did not trace any such threat as that to any reliable source.
Q. What effect did the killing of Big Snake have upon the Poncas themselves—upon their feelings toward the agency and the Government?
A. It had a very bad effect; about the same effect it would have upon you or me if some person was to kill a brother of ours. I think the killing of Big Snake by the soldiers was an unwarrantable act; an act indicative of great cowardice on the part of all parties immediately connected with it. At the time of the killing there were ten or twelve soldiers present in the office; Big Snake was alone and unarmed. I cannot see the necessity of killing an unarmed man, confined in a room, and surrounded by eighteen or twenty men, a dozen or more of whom were armed soldiers. It looked to me, to put it in plain English, like a cowardly, willful murder.

I did not intend to characterize that transaction beyond what the

PRINTING OF EDUCATIONAL BILL.

Mr. BURNSIDE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 1,000 copies of Senate bill No. 133, it being the so-called educational bill, be printed.

GENERAL U. S. GRANT.

Mr. LOGAN. I intended this morning, if I could do so without interfering with the business of the Senate, to call up Senate bill No. 1992; but the hour having passed, I desire to say a word to Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber who remarked the other day that they had not had time to consider this bill. If the Senate will agree that we may take it up on Thursday or on Friday, at any hour that may be suggested, I shall be very glad, and then let it be disposed of in some way. I do not wish to interfere with the appropriation bills; but it seems to me we might take up this bill and dispose of it in an hour at any time. If the Senate will consent to make it the special order of the day for Thursday or for Friday, I shall be glad to have it done. I move that it be made the special order of the day for Thursday at two o'clock.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the bill about?

Mr. LOGAN. In regard to placing General Grant on the retired list.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves that the bill (S. No. 1992) to place Ulysses S. Grant, late General and ex-President of the United States, upon the retired list of the Army be made the special order for Thursday at two o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS and others. There is.

Mr. EATON. I object; and for this reason: there are several matters of very great public importance that have already been brought before the Senate. I think that this bill which was introduced by my friend from Illinois can wait a week without endangering either the bill or the public, and therefore it strikes me it ought not to be made a special order.

sician in my town, of long experience and long practice, in regard to the matter. He said he had been examiner for a good many years there, and that the compensation was wholly inadequate for the duty required and the records he was required to make and transmit. The compensation allowed, $1, was so inconsiderable that he thought it was not worth while to continue in the service. He held the place ccommodation to the pensioners, and not for any profit at it gave him a great deal of trouble for which he was pensated. I do not know whether that is the general examining surgeons or not. Perhaps the Senator can planation showing whether the committee considers it

This proviso was attached to the pension appropria- st year, and we had information from the bureau that ons were just as satisfactory at $1 as they had been at doubt that there are instances where the compensa- all, but on the whole we thought it was better to limit average service was just as good. The Commissioner so informed us that unless this limitation be put upon l be compelled to ask for an increase of the present ap- om $250,000 to $375,000. It was upon that information so was inserted.

DING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Sen- ans [Mr. INGALLS] will now be reported.

LS. The Senator from California states that the com- to offer one other amendment before mine is acted on.

. I do not know that I can characterize it as a com- nent, although most of the members of the committee agreed to it, but without any formal meeting. I will desk that it may be read.

DING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the California will be reported.

'ARY. It is proposed to add after line 33, at the end of xamining surgeons as provided by the several acts of Congress, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 6552) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

The bill was read.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "dollar," in line 28, to insert:

Provided, That a fee of $1, and no more, shall be paid to the examining surgeon for each examination of a pensioner as provided by law, except when the examination is made by a board of surgeons, in which case the fees now allowed by law shall be paid.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out in lines 24, 25, and 26 of the bill the following words:

And accrued pension due the Indian pensioners shall, in the discretion of the Commissioner of Pensions, be paid in installments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been usual to act upon the amendments proposed by the committee presenting the bill first.

Mr. INGALLS. That does not prevent my making the motion to amend, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at all.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not ask action on the amendment until after the committee's amendments have been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, commencing on page 2, line 29.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Before that amendment is finally adopted, I should like to inquire of the Senator having charge of the bill if he has any information that that compensation, $1, is considered a proper compensation for the examination. I have heard myself from a phy-

Mr. BOOTH. I send to the desk two communications to be read, showing the necessity for the appropriations. Let the printed communication, which is Executive Document No. 13, be first read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 20, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of letter of the Commissioner of Pensions, setting forth the necessity for additional appropriation, for the current fiscal year, for the Army and Navy pension fund, which I commend to your early and favorable consideration.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

| Army invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives, survivors and widows of the war of 1812 | $31,475,000 |
| Navy invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives | 575,000 |

To December 1, there had been drawn from the Army appropriation, $25,667,331.69; from the Navy appropriation, $570,274.99; from fees of examining surgeons, $81,268.

It will require not less than $5,000,000 additional to pay the Army pensions to March 1, and $125,000 to pay the Navy pensions to the same date, leaving the March and June quarterly payments and the first payments upon new cases which will be settled during the last four months of the year to be provided for.

The quarterly payments of Army pensions will require $6,500,000 each, or $13,000,000 for both, and probably not less than $5,500,000 for the first payments to new pensions.

Q. Was the agent afraid of Big Snake?

A. I told the agent that I was with Big Snake all the time. I said, "I never heard him say that he hated you." I told the agent that Big Snake did not go to see him because they had had a few words before Big Snake went to visit that other tribe and was arrested. I told him that Indians when they have a few words between each other do not talk to each other for a good while.

Q. Did the agent say that he was afraid that Big Snake was going to hurt him?

A. I said to the agent that if I knew that Big Snake hated him, I would have told him so.

Q. What did he say to that?

A. He told me that Big Snake did not come to see him, and did not talk to him, and so he thought that Big Snake hated him, and that he would get killed by him some time.

Q. Did he tell you that the Government had authorized him to send soldiers there to take off Big Snake?

A. He told me that he wrote to one of the head men, one of the officers, that one of the Ponca Indians hated him, and he was afraid of him; and that the officer sent soldiers to inquire into the matter.

Q. Did he say that those soldiers had come there to inquire into the matter?

A. I do not know whether they inquired or not. I told the agent that if he had asked me I would have told him how Big Snake felt. Big Snake was ashamed to go and see the agent, because he had arrested Big Snake and put him in jail just for nothing. Big Snake asked me to go and ask the agent to give him a wagon; he was ashamed to go and ask favors of the agent himself after the agent had put him in jail.

Q. Was Big Snake a peaceable Indian or an ugly one?

A. Big Snake was a very good man, and the Indians all liked him.

Q. Did he try to persuade the Poncas against staying down in the Indian Territory?

A. I do not know anything about that, whether he did or not. I know that he wanted to go back to the reservation himself.

Q. Did the soldiers bury the body of Big Snake after they killed him?

A. I do not know. I heard that they did not do anything with the body.

Q. What did the Ponca people—

Now, I ask the Senate to indulge me long enough to read this—

Q. What did the Ponca people say about it when they heard that Big Snake was killed?

A. After he was killed I asked the agent to give me something—I wanted to call the tribe together—to feast on; and he gave me something. I got them all together—all the young men—and I told them that it would be best for us to live in a very peaceful way. I told them that although we felt very bad that Big Snake was killed, yet if we do not do anything bad some good people will right that wrong when they hear about it.

Q. Did the young men want to make trouble because Big Snake was killed?

A. I did not know; but I was afraid so, and so I said that to them.

Q. Did the young men feel very bad because Big Snake was killed?

A. Big Snake was a very good man, and the tribe all thought a great deal of him, and the tribe all cried.

Now, sir, a single word about the character of this transaction, not from myself but from another. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] complained of me yesterday that I characterized this agent as a coward. I did not characterize him as a coward; I used the words of another. He was characterized as a coward, not by me; I took the words of the officials who are being defended to-day and not my own, and I will now read them. Mr. Inspector Pollock, to whom I alluded yesterday, was sent down into the Indian Territory to look up this man's accounts, as I stated yesterday. When he went there he made a thorough investigation of the killing of Big Snake, because it was in the way of everything else, and I will read what he says:

Q. Did the killing of Big Snake have anything to do with your suspension of the agent?

A. No, sir; that was not a point in question.

Q. Were you instructed by the Department to inquire into the circumstances attending the killing of Big Snake?

A. No, sir; that matter was not specifically mentioned.

Q. You say that you have no doubt the agent was afraid of Big Snake; did you inquire among the Indians to ascertain whether he had any reasonable grounds for this fear?

A. I talked the matter over generally with both Indians and white people. I am of the opinion that the killing of Big Snake, like the removal of the Poncas from Dakota, was an unfortunate mistake.

Q. You think it grew out of the fact that the agent was afraid of Big Snake?

A. Yes, sir; after his return from Fort Reno, he had very little dealings with the agent; he imagined that he had been wronged by the agent, and he felt it very keenly. Indians, as a general rule, prefer death to confinement—what they call "going to the guard-house." And after Big Snake returned from his confinement, when he saw the agent, from time to time, he would point at him and remark, "Pe-azh."

Q. Is that a term of reproach?

A. Yes, sir; it means "mean" or "bad." That was about all that passed between the two after Big Snake's return from Fort Reno.

This Indian agent, in order to restore order among these Indians, after a writ of habeas corpus had delivered this chief's brother, had caused him to be incarcerated from the 18th day of May until the 4th day of August, which the Senator from Iowa, in front of me [Mr. ALLISON] thought meant an immediate release of all but three.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. DAWES. Now, do not interrupt me.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but——

Mr. DAWES. And the Senator said that the Interior Department ordered all those Indians released immediately with the exception of three. This was one of the three who was kept there from the 18th day of May until the 4th of August without cause, and he had the hardihood to say that the man who did it was mean, and that was all, and for that he lost his life.

Q. Did you investigate the question whether Big Snake had really threatened the life of the agent or not?

A. That is a disputed point; I did not trace any such threat as that to any reliable source.

Q. What effect did the killing of Big Snake have upon the Poncas themselves—upon their feelings toward the agency and the Government?

A. It had a very bad effect; about the same effect it would have upon you or me if some person was to kill a brother of ours. I think the killing of Big Snake by the soldiers was an unwarrantable act; an act indicative of great cowardice on the part of all parties immediately connected with it. At the time of the killing there were ten or twelve soldiers present in the office; Big Snake was alone and unarmed. I cannot see the necessity of killing an unarmed man, confined in a room, and surrounded by eighteen or twenty men, a dozen or more of whom were armed soldiers. It looked to me, to put it in plain English, like a cowardly, willful murder.

I did not intend to characterize that transaction beyond what the record in possession of the Senate justified me in doing.

Now, sir, one word upon the evidence just repeated by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] that Esau heard some one tell a soldier not to fire. The agent testified in another place that he told the soldier not to fire unless he thought there was danger, and he testified also that the soldier stood there with his gun aimed at the head of this man ready to fire when, according to his judgment, there might be reason for it.

Sir, this whole discussion has arisen from an utter mistake on the part of the Interior Department of the purpose of the resolution itself and of the criticism of the officer. It was not an attempt to involve the Interior Department in this transaction. It was an honest effort from the beginning to give the Interior Department an opportunity, which it was honestly believed it desired, to put upon the records of this country its disapproval of that act. The act was justifiable, excusable, or deserving condemnation. If justifiable, the men participating in it were entitled to thus much in answer to this resolution; if excusable, they were entitled to that excuse upon the records here from their superior; and if it was neither justifiable nor excusable, the Interior Department should not have been slow to wash its hands of it; and that it did not was the amazement and the complaint of those who called upon its head for this information solely to give him the opportunity to do so. I regret it sincerely as one attached to this Administration politically and personally; I regret as much as any Senator here can that there should ever be an occasion to animadvert on any of its acts or its omissions. I have not been swift to do it. I have held back in my seat, indirectly endeavoring to get upon the records of the Senate something that I could hold up against this dark background, something that I could hold up against all this record of the Poncas, none of which have I presented to the Senate until yesterday. That I have not succeeded is not my fault.

LAND IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

Mr. BOOTH. I ask the Senate to lay aside the pending order temporarily in order to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 6532, being the pension appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks that the regular order, being the Indian severalty bill, be temporarily laid aside in order that he may call up an appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. COKE. I yield for that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from California, and the pending order is laid aside temporarily and informally.

Mr. CALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1773) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the act (S. No. 1396) authorizing the persons therein named to accept of certain decorations and presents therein named, from foreign governments, and for other purposes.

PRINTING OF EDUCATIONAL BILL.

Mr. BURNSIDE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 1,000 copies of Senate bill No. 133, it being the so-called educational bill, be printed.

GENERAL U. S. GRANT.

Mr. LOGAN. I intended this morning, if I could do so without interfering with the business of the Senate, to call up Senate bill No. 1992; but the hour having passed, I desire to say a word to Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber who remarked the other day that they had not had time to consider this bill. If the Senate will agree that we may take it up on Thursday or on Friday, at any hour that may be suggested, I shall be very glad, and then let it be disposed of in some way. I do not wish to interfere with the appropriation bills; but it seems to me we might take up this bill and dispose of it in an hour at any time. If the Senate will consent to make it the special order of the day for Thursday or for Friday, I shall be glad to have it done. I move that it be made the special order of the day for Thursday at two o'clock.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the bill about?

Mr. LOGAN. In regard to placing General Grant on the retired list.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves that the bill (S. No. 1992) to place Ulysses S. Grant, late General and ex-President of the United States, upon the retired list of the Army be made the special order for Thursday at two o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS and others. There is.

Mr. EATON. I object; and for this reason: there are several matters of very great public importance that have already been brought before the Senate. I think that this bill which was introduced by my friend from Illinois can wait a week without endangering either the bill or the public, and therefore it strikes me it ought not to be made a special order.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no doubt about its being proper for it to wait if the Senate desire that. I certainly shall defer to the will of the Senate. I always do. There are important bills, I know, and this is one of small importance; but it does seem to me that some consideration ought to be given to it by the Senate of the United States. When the Senate can listen to an hour's talk—I will not say an argument—for the purpose of convicting somebody of something that has transpired that few persons know anything about, and a thing outside of the jurisdiction of the Senate, when there is no ability in the Senate to raise the dead or to discover the dead or to do anything for the dead, especially for the dead Indians, and when the Senate can take up time in discussing a matter that is not before the Senate at all except merely to give an opportunity to talk about it, it does seem to me the Senate might give a few minutes' consideration to a bill of this importance. That was the reason I made the suggestion. I desired to accommodate myself to the views of the Senate; but if the Senate is determined that this bill is not to be considered at all, I give notice now that I will call it up to-morrow morning and ask for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator withdraw his motion to make it the special order for Thursday?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I do not. I ask that the vote be taken on that motion.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Illinois knows that I am a friend of this measure, and would be glad to do all that I could to advance it; but he is aware undoubtedly that the motion cannot be entertained unless the pending order is disposed of in some way. The Chair, as I understand, cannot entertain a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill while another one is pending. The pending order must be either postponed or laid on the table.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not ask to proceed to the consideration of the bill now.

Mr. INGALLS. But the Senator asks that some order be made about the disposition of the bill that he has called up.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that it be made the special order for the day fixed at two o'clock.

Mr. INGALLS. That motion cannot be made while this other bill is pending. This bill must be laid aside before the motion can be made.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I call for the regular order. This discussion is a loss of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If a question of order is raised upon it, the Chair will be compelled to hold that the motion of the Senator from Illinois is not in order.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Kansas.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOOTH. I believe the pension appropriation bill is before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Indian severalty bill having been temporarily laid aside for the purpose of taking up the appropriation bill, the Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. BOOTH. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 6532.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

The bill was read.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "dollar," in line 28, to insert:

Provided, That a fee of $1, and no more, shall be paid to the examining surgeon for each examination of a pensioner as provided by law, except when the examination is made by a board of surgeons, in which case the fees now allowed by law shall be paid.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out in lines 24, 25, and 26 of the bill the following words:

And accrued pension due the Indian pensioners shall, in the discretion of the Commissioner of Pensions, be paid in installments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been usual to act upon the amendments proposed by the committee presenting the bill first.

Mr. INGALLS. That does not prevent my making the motion to amend, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at all.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not ask action on the amendment until after the committee's amendments have been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, commencing on page 2, line 29.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Before that amendment is finally adopted, I should like to inquire of the Senator having charge of the bill if he has any information that that compensation, $1, is considered a proper compensation for the examination. I have heard myself from a physician in my town, of long experience and long practice, in regard to the matter. He said he had been examiner for a good many years there, and that the compensation was wholly inadequate for the duty required and the records he was required to make and transmit. The compensation allowed, $1, was so inconsiderable that he thought it was not worth while to continue in the service. He held the place simply as an accommodation to the pensioners, and not for any profit to himself; that it gave him a great deal of trouble for which he was not at all compensated. I do not know whether that is the general experience of examining surgeons or not. Perhaps the Senator can give some explanation showing whether the committee considers it proper.

Mr. BOOTH. This proviso was attached to the pension appropriation bill of last year, and we had information from the bureau that the examinations were just as satisfactory at $1 as they had been at $2. I have no doubt that there are instances where the compensation is very small, but on the whole we thought it was better to limit it to $1, as the average service was just as good. The Commissioner of Pensions also informed us that unless this limitation be put upon this fee he will be compelled to ask for an increase of the present appropriation from $250,000 to $375,000. It was upon that information that the proviso was inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been agreed to.

The next amendment reported from the Committee on Appropriations was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 2. All pensions payable, or to be paid under this act, to pensioners who are inmates of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall be paid to the treasurer or treasurers of said home, to be disbursed for the benefit of the pensioners under regulations to be established by the managers of the home; said payment to be made by the pension agent upon a certificate of the proper officer of the home that the pensioner is an inmate thereof and is still living. Any balance of the pension which may remain at the date of the pensioner's discharge shall be paid over to him; and in case of his death at the home, the same shall be paid to the widow or minor children under sixteen years of age, if any there be: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent an absolute assignment of his pension by a pensioner having neither wife, child, nor parent dependent upon him, as now provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] will now be reported.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from California states that the committee desire to offer one other amendment before mine is acted on.

Mr. BOOTH. I do not know that I can characterize it as a committee amendment, although most of the members of the committee this morning agreed to it, but without any formal meeting. I will send it to the desk that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add after line 33, at the end of section 1:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, namely:

For pensions for Army invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives, including arrears, survivors of the war of 1812 and widows of the war of 1812, $17,692,031.69: Provided, That the amount expended for each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

For Navy pensions of invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives, $560,274.99: Provided, That the appropriations aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund so far as the same may be sufficient for that purpose: And provided further, That the amount expended for each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

For fees of examining surgeons as provided by the several acts of Congress, $30,000.

Mr. BOOTH. I send to the desk two communications to be read, showing the necessity for the appropriations. Let the printed communication, which is Executive Document No. 13, be first read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 20, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of letter of the Commissioner of Pensions, setting forth the necessity for additional appropriation, for the current fiscal year, for the Army and Navy pension fund, which I commend to your early and favorable consideration.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. SCHURZ,
Secretary of the Interior.

Hon. W. A. WHEELER,

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 20, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to the condition of the appropriations for Army and Navy pensions, and for fees of examining surgeons, for the current year.

The act of January 13, 1880, appropriated for these purposes as follows:

| Army invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives, survivors and widows of the war of 1812 | $31,475,000 |
| Navy invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives | 575,000 |

To December 1, there had been drawn from the Army appropriation, $25,667,331.69; from the Navy appropriation, $570,274.99; from fees of examining surgeons, $81,268.

It will require not less than $5,000,000 additional to pay the Army pensions to March 1, and $125,000 to pay the Navy pensions to the same date, leaving the March and June quarterly payments and the first payments upon new cases which will be settled during the last four months of the year to be provided for.

The quarterly payments of Army pensions will require $6,500,000 each, or $13,000,000 for both, and probably not less than $5,500,000 for the first payments to new pensions.

The Navy quarterly payments will require $160,000 each, or $320,000 for both quarters, and for first payments on new Navy pensions, probably $120,000 additional. There will be required besides for the payment of Navy pensions to cover those unpaid for the December quarter, and the first payments upon new cases to March 1, as nearly as can be estimated, $125,000. Making for the current year—

| Navy pensions | 1,135,274 99 |

It will be seen, then, that additional appropriations for the pensions for the current year will be required as follows:

| Army invalids, &c | $17,692,031 69 |
| Navy invalids, &c | 560,274 99 |

A further appropriation of $30,000 for the fees of examining surgeons will also be required.

The Navy appropriation is already exhausted, and the additional appropriation for the Navy pensions should be made without delay.

Very respectfully,

J. A. BENTLEY,
Commissioner of Pensions.

Hon. C. SCHURZ,
Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, February 1, 1881.

SIR: The quarterly pensions due March 4th next cannot be paid until the additional appropriation for pensions for the current year shall have been made.

Upon inquiry I find that if that appropriation is placed upon the general deficiency bill the funds will not be available in time to enable the agents to make the payments promptly.

I beg leave, therefore, to suggest the propriety of adding a clause to the pension bill now pending in the Senate providing for the necessary appropriation.

Very respectfully,

J. A. BENTLEY,
Commissioner of Pensions.

Hon. NEWTON BOOTH,
United States Senate.

Mr. BOOTH. I suppose those communications sufficiently disclose the character of this amendment and the necessity for it. It is really a deficiency. Unless this appropriation is made in time, the March payments to pensioners cannot be made, as it is probable that the deficiency bill will not pass both Houses of Congress and become a law in time to make the distribution to the pension agents before the 4th of March. Most of the members of the Appropriation Committee, all I believe that I have had an opportunity to consult, thought it was wise to put this deficiency really upon this bill in order that it may be made available in time.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As the Senator from California has said, the Committee on Appropriations has not acted upon this amendment appropriating $18,000,000 and upward. It is a deficiency for the present year. In other words, the appropriation for the current year has been about exhausted, and there are a little over eighteen million dollars additional wanted. This amendment is to cover that. It is a large sum, but we must remember that we passed the arrears-of-pensions act a short time ago, and that takes a great deal of money, more than any one probably had ever estimated for. I had intended to make and probably shall make some remarks on the arrears-of-pensions act when an amendment looking to some more effective way of stopping frauds shall be presented to the Senate by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions shall be offered as an amendment to this bill.

It appears to me to be necessary to appropriate this $18,000,000 and upward to pay the pension-roll as it now exists, and it calls the attention of the country and the Senate to the fact that, although the full estimate was voted for the current year, we have a deficiency here of over eighteen million dollars. I agree with the Senator who offered the amendment, though the committee did not act upon it, that it is necessary that early action should take place, and that the money should be appropriated now, so as to pay the pensioners regularly. If this amendment is not adopted, I understand from the Commissioner of Pensions he will not be able to pay the regular pensioners even on the 1st day of March, if that is the day. My colleague on the committee [Mr. BECK] says it is the 4th day of March, but I understand that for a part of them it is the 1st day of February. I think I am right in my statement, though my colleagues from Kentucky and Virginia differ with me a little. I think that so far as the Navy pensions are concerned to-day, they are in arrears, and the Pension Office have not the money to pay them; but so far as the regular-roll is concerned, my colleague on my left [Mr. BECK] is right in saying that the payment comes on the 1st or the 4th of March. I think that the amendment ought to be added to the bill.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to add that the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the Finance Committee, in a discussion before that committee which I believe was public, and stated to that committee that unless this money was paid now the men who were justly entitled to it would be done gross injustice. Therefore I, for one, agreed to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California, [Mr. BOOTH.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I now ask for action on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas will be reported.

The SECRETARY. After the word "separately," in line 24 of section 1, it is proposed to strike out down to and including the word "installments," in line 26, as follows:

And accrued pension due the Indian pensioners shall, in the discretion of the Commissioner of Pensions, be paid in installments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Although the Senator from California has charge of the bill, I should be glad to hear from the Senator who moves the amendment the reason why he wishes this clause stricken out.

Mr. INGALLS. I should be very glad to have some person say why it should be retained in the bill. Here is a certain number of Indian pensioners who served in the Union Army and were wounded or disabled and have earned pensions, to which they are just as much entitled as any white soldier or any negro soldier, and without any statement as to the amount, or any statement as to the reason, this bill contains a provision invidious and unnecessary that "accrued pensions due Indian pensioners shall, in the discretion of the Commissioner of Pensions, be paid in installments." That is to say, he is authorized to withhold from men who were in the Union Army as Indian soldiers the amount of pensions they have earned, to which the law says they are entitled. It makes him the guardian of these men, and permits him to dole out in driblets from time to time such amount of money as he may think they are entitled to receive. Until there be some reason given and some statistics furnished showing the amount that these men have earned and the argument on which this provision is based, I shall certainly hope that there is justice enough in the Senate to say that if an Indian was good enough to be in the Army and brave enough to earn a pension, he is honest and intelligent enough to receive it.

Mr. BOOTH. This provision was in the bill as it came from the House and is the result, I suppose, of a suggestion from the Commissioner of Pensions. I will read an extract from his report on page 11. Referring to this class of pensioners, the Commissioner says:

The great distance of these pensioners from the nearest agency for the payment of pensions renders it impracticable to require them to appear personally at the agency and receive their pensions as provided in section 4765, Revised Statutes, referred to. It is, moreover, questionable whether such considerable sums of money as are now due them ought to be placed all at once in the pensioners' hands. I am clearly of the opinion that it should not be done, and that not more than $200 of the accrued pension should be paid to any Indian pensioner at one time. I respectfully recommend, therefore, that a law be enacted authorizing the Department to pay the accrued pensions to Indian pensioners in installments.

If the accrued pensions shall be paid in moderate installments it is probable that the pensioners will be able to obtain the money for their pension-checks of the merchants in the Territory at reasonable rates of exchange and not be subjected to exorbitant and ruinous rates as they otherwise would be.

Mr. INGALLS. If that is all the foundation on which this provision is retained in the bill, I must say it is very flimsy and unsubstantial. There was a brigade of soldiers recruited from what are known as the civilized Indians in the Indian Territory, who served gallantly and efficiently during the civil war in behalf of the Union. They were officered by men of their own nationality, and were under the command of Brigadier-General William A. Phillips, of Kansas. At the close of the war they were mustered out. They received their pay and bounty like other soldiers; and those who were disabled either by disease or wounds, applied to the Pension Bureau in due form, stating the fact of their service and the fact of their disability, and in due process of law their claims were adjudicated and they were held to be entitled to so much money as pensioners. Now, without any reason whatever except the fact that they reside at some distance from the agency, the Commissioner of Pensions recommends that he shall have the right to withhold the money from these men and deal it out to them in installments as he sees fit. I hope the Senate will not be imposed upon by such a presentation as that.

Mr. BECK. As one member of the committee I agreed to retaining the clause, because while the Indians are entitled to their pensions, many of them are known to be ignorant and improvident. The same reason that would induce us to give the men who have charge of the soldiers' homes some jurisdiction over the expenditure of the money of white soldiers there, applies more emphatically to the expenditure of pensions due to Indians. If the Indian gets the money all at once, the chances are that in some improvident way he will spend it all, or some man a good deal smarter than he is will get it away from him. Then he will be left a pensioner on the country, poor and destitute, without means and without anybody to see that he is cared for, and appeals will be made to us from time to time that this man is suffering in distress, all of which will be true; that he fought in the Army and ought to be cared for; that he ought not to be allowed to suffer; and perhaps we shall have to see that he does not; whereas if this money is put in the care of some officer of the Government (and we have to trust Government officials) to see that the Indian is cared for, there will be enough of it perhaps to make him comfortable as long as he lives.

That seemed to be the prevailing idea both of the House and of the committee; and why should it not be so? Is it contended that because a man was a soldier and fought well and was wounded in the service, therefore necessarily he is an intelligent and competent man to manage his own affairs? Why do we now provide for the Indians, that they shall be protected and their lands shall not be subject to taxation or alienation for twenty-five years? Because they are not fit to be placed in sharp competition with the men surrounding them; because we seek to protect them from the influences which tend to make men vicious who are comparatively ignorant? We admit the right of the Indians to this money, but at the same time it should be given to them in such form as will do them the most good and guard them most carefully against imposition from men who are vicious or smarter than themselves. That is the whole of the proposition. We know that if a large sum of money should be paid to these Indians at once, the chances are that it would not do them any good. It is like giving a blanket to an Indian on the Fourth of July—he would swap it for a quart of whisky; but give it to him when the thermometer is below zero and you cannot buy it from him at all. We have to take care of the Indian. He is a ward of the nation, and we want to give the money to him to the best advantage, and we do not want to give it to him so that men can take advantage of his ignorance and leave him an object of charity on our hands as a destitute soldier, when he might be well cared for if there was somebody to watch over him.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Kentucky states as the reason why he desires to apply this rule to the Indians, that they are ignorant and improvident, and liable to be imposed upon. Why not apply the same rule to the colored soldiers in this country who are in the same condition?

Mr. BECK. They were never in the same condition; they have had many advantages that the poor Indian has never had.

Mr. INGALLS. If the pension that a soldier has earned by reason of disability through disease or wound, he is to be deprived of because he is ignorant, and we are to establish a general system of care and guardianship over the soldiers of this country, it is something that ought to be applied uniformly to all classes alike. If we are to begin to say that when a soldier has earned a pension he shall not be paid the pension unless he has shown that he possesses high qualifications of intelligence and capacity to manage his own affairs, we have introduced a new principle into the administration of this Government.

The fact is that these Indians do not belong to the class that the Senator from Kentucky has described. This brigade was exclusively recruited from the civilized nations of the Indian Territory. The companies were officered by Indians. They fought gallantly and with distinction throughout the war on the Union side. They were under the command of eminent Union generals; and we have not been shown by any testimony whatever that they are incapable of managing their own affairs, or that there is any such sum of money, even if they were incapable of managing their own affairs, that it is necessary to divide it to them in installments for the purpose of dribbling it out at the discretion of the Commissioner of Pensions in such sums as he in his judgment may think they are qualified to take care of.

The Commissioner of Pensions cannot know anything whatever about the condition of these Indians unless he makes specific personal inquiry, and it is an invidious, unjust, and, in my judgment, unconstitutional provision to insert in this bill. If these men were good enough to be received as soldiers in the Army, and brave enough to incur disability in the service of the country, we ought to be just enough to pay them the pensions we owe them, and not allow some subordinate inferior officer here to withhold what we have admitted to be their due, and to say, without any evidence before us, how much they shall be entitled to receive from day to day, or from month to month, or from year to year, of what is just as much their money as the Senator's salary is his money.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not care to take any part in this discussion, but I must say that the proposition in the bill is a very remarkable one. I can very readily see how it got in there, for I think if there has been any attempt made in this country in ages past by any officer of the Government to take everything into his own hands and to recognize everybody on the pension roll as either a thief or a drunkard, the exhibition in some of the reports with reference to pensioners has shown that fact to the country.

I agree with the Senator from Kansas that after a man has been awarded a pension from the Government, it is not right that we should undertake to say that he is not qualified to receive the money himself, and follow him up and see what disposition he makes of it; how he disposes of it, and pursue him, and give power to a man to say it shall be dribbled out to him a dollar at a time, or two dollars at a time, so as to encourage him to spend it, if he gets it in small amounts, for that which will be entirely worthless to him. I think it is something that is going far beyond anything I have ever known before.

So far as the proposition in reference to the soldiers' homes is concerned, I do not even believe in that, although that amendment is in the bill and I made no objection to it; but I am not going to give my reason now for not believing in it. I believe the pensioners of this country who were the soldiers of this country are just as well qualified to take care of themselves as other people are, and, whether white, black, or Indian, they do not thank the Congress of the United States for all the time insinuating that they are mere paupers and not competent to control and govern themselves, and, according to the theory that some men have who are in position, we should dole out pensions, on account of a little brief authority that they have conferred upon them by acts of Congress, intimating to the country that every man perpetrates a fraud on the Government who applies for a pension. Such things are heard every day; not here, but elsewhere; and I for one am tired of hearing them. I am opposed to any distinction being made in the law in reference to men who have served their country when they are pensioners on the pension-rolls of the country.

Mr. BOOTH. Before the question is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, I desire to offer an amendment to the text, which I believe takes precedence. I move to strike out the words "Commissioner of Pensions" and insert "Secretary of the Interior," so that there will be given a discretion to the Secretary of the Interior. I have not the bill before me, so that I cannot refer to the line.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California moves to amend that portion of the bill which the Senator from Kansas moves to strike out, by striking out therefrom the words "Commissioner of Pensions" and inserting in lieu thereof "Secretary of the Interior." Is there objection to that amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. That is not an amendment to my amendment. That is an amendment to the text of the bill, the part to be stricken out, of course, on which the question must be first taken. I have no objection to that amendment being made without any division of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is perfecting the text and takes precedence of the motion to strike out.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I think this clause of the bill proceeds upon an entirely erroneous theory. The Commissioner states the question in his report as read by the Senator from California. His idea is that on account of the great distance of the pensioners from the Indian agencies the pensions should be paid in this way. If it is a burden to the Indian to go once a quarter or once a year to the Indian agency for the purpose of receiving his money, how much would that burden be added to by requiring him to go four or five or six times as often in order that he may get the money in so many installments in place of getting it all at once? There is no lack of proper agencies for converting pension drafts into money. Whether the pensioner gets $100, or $200, or $500, he will find abundant purchasers at the agencies and at the different towns along the route of railroads running through the Indian Territory where he can get his drafts cashed. There will be no trouble whatever upon that point.

In the next place, I think it is a gratuitous insult to assume that the men who, as my colleague stated, served their country as well as they knew how, more or less, and at the call of their country, and received the bounty, amounting to three hundred dollars each, which the Government provided for soldiers who received it in gross and received their pay at the intervals at which other soldiers were paid, sometimes two months, sometimes four months, and received that in gross and could be relied upon, as they were relied upon, to spend that properly, cannot be relied upon in the same way with this pension at this late day, fifteen years after they were discharged from the service; and after they have had the benefit in the mean time of large contact with the white race. These men have not only during the last fifteen years, but during the previous twenty-five or thirty years, been doing business for themselves. They receive annuities from the General Government every year. They are accustomed to handling money. They have got as far along as you may reasonably expect the Indians to get on this continent, and if they are not now capable of handling the small sum of money which shall be paid to them under the provisions of this bill, then no Indian on this continent ever will be fit to take care of himself.

These are the flower of the North American Indians. They are the result of the best efforts which the Indian has been able to make, accompanied by corresponding efforts on the part of the white men and of the Government, toward civilization, toward self-dependence and self-support, and they are as competent now as they ever will be to take this money and properly spend it. I think, as I said, that it would be an invidious distinction, it would be substantially an insult to these men whose services the Government was glad to get, whose ability to serve it was amply recognized as people able to receive and properly expend their pay and bounty, now at this late day to say to them, "You are not competent to spend the pension which you earned by disease or wounds incurred in the line of duty."

Mr. BOOTH. I do not regard this provision as of sufficient importance to excite feeling or to lead to any very extended argument. I believe the amount that each of these Indian pensioners would be entitled to as arrears would be about eleven hundred dollars. The committee thought, whether wisely or unwisely, justly or unjustly, that it would do more good to pay it to each individual in installments than to pay it to him in gross at one time.

Mr. INGALLS. How much, if the Senator will permit an interruption, did the committee think it would be advisable and safe to pay them at one time?

Mr. BOOTH. The committee did not take that matter into consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. The committee ought to have done that. They ought to have advised us just exactly how much the Indian would be authorized to receive.

Mr. BOOTH. The simple question as it presented itself to the committee was as to which method should be most profitable to the Indian himself; that was all. In dealing with the tribes the Government of the United States is in the habit of paying annuities. It does not capitalize those annuities and pay the whole capital over to the Indians to be divided among the members of the tribes. But as I have said, it is a matter of comparatively little importance, and I do not think it ought to lead to any exhibition of feeling or to any protracted argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. TELLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WITHERS. The whole theory of the bill in respect to this provision which has been so much criticised is that the amount of pension paid to the Indians shall be so paid as to benefit them to the greatest possible extent. The Commissioner of Pensions in his recommendation suggests that the arrears, which would amount to a considerable sum, instead of being paid to the Indians in bulk should be paid by installments, if in the discretion of the Commissioner of Pensions or the Secretary of the Interior, as the bill now stands, it should be best to do so. The sole motive is the benefit of the pensioner. Nobody proposes to deprive him of one cent of the pension to which he is clearly entitled. It is simply a question, just as it was presented with reference to the inmates of the soldiers' homes, as to whether the amount to be paid to them should be paid them in bulk or paid to them in installments; and the question for the Senate to decide is whether in their judgment the one or the other would be most beneficial to the Indians. It is possible that the Senator from Kansas may be correct, and that it would benefit the Indians more to pay it to them in bulk, but the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate were of a different opinion. That is the whole of it.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Virginia has not correctly stated the purpose of this provision of the bill if the Commissioner of Pensions understands its design. I asked him a short time ago, since the Senate assembled this afternoon, if he would be kind enough to advise me what the object was in placing that provision in the bill, and he said that it was placed there because the Department had an idea that in consequence of some frauds which had heretofore been committed in relation to Indian affairs perhaps there was danger that some disreputable persons might get hold of the checks, and by that means the funds would be diverted from the persons who are entitled to them to those who are unauthorized. That is the explanation the Commissioner of Pensions gave me, and I violate no confidence in saying that, because I made a request upon him as a public officer for information upon a subject of public importance. The object is not to do good to the Indian by giving out to him such a portion as he is competent to manage from time to time, but to exercise guardianship over him for fear that there may be some person who will in some mysterious way or other get possession of the evidence of indebtedness and deprive the Indian of the pension to which he is entitled.

Mr. WITHERS. With all due respect to my friend from Kansas, I will state that in my judgment I have correctly stated the reasons, or one of the reasons, which influenced the Commissioner of Pensions in his recommendation, and the Senator certainly violates no courtesy or privilege in the disclosure he has made, inasmuch as it is repeated almost verbatim in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, on page 11, which was read by the Senator who has charge of the bill. Both causes united in inducing him to make the recommendation which is incorporated in this bill. The Senator is not unaware of the fact that it is because of the large arrears of pensions which will be due in some cases that in the judgment of the Commissioner this is unnecessary.

I repeat that the sole object of the provision is to protect the Indian from wrong and to pay the money out to him in such manner as may secure to him the greatest benefit possibly to be derived from the payment. I do not understand that because it is designed, as the Commissioner says, to protect him from fraudulent acts on the part of designing men therefore it is not designed to benefit him. It strikes me that that is an argument directly in the line of securing benefit to the Indian, in protecting him from fraud. But it is a matter that is not of very great moment. However, I wanted, in defense of the Appropriations Committee, who reported the bill with this language in it, to show that the idea was not so preposterous and absurd as the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Illinois would have the Senate believe.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator. Nobody questions the motive that actuated the committee; they desire to benefit the Indians; but I should like to know upon what basis they form their judgment that the Indians would be benefited by depriving them of the right to obtain the money themselves. Under what theory is it?

Mr. WITHERS. I have just stated what is the theory.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator says that it is thought the Indian will be benefited, but then we do not get at the reason why it is that he will be benefited. Somebody may deprive him of it. How will somebody deprive him of it? It does not make any difference whether you give it to him in quarterly installments, or in semi-annual installments, or in annual installments, the same opportunity is afforded to men who would act dishonestly with him in a small amount as in a large amount. If it is a mere matter of the fraudulent obtainment of checks it will be a matter of indifference to the Indians whether they are to be paid one way or the other. It certainly cannot be that. Is there any basis, has the Commissioner any basis for making this recommendation, on the ground that improper vouchers, fraudulent or forged checks, or anything of that kind, the Indian has been improperly induced to sign? Under the pension law now, the voucher has to go to the pensioner himself and not to the agent. You are distrusting the man himself. It is not that you distrust some agent, because under the law the agent cannot interfere with the check. So I cannot understand the basis or theory upon which the committee act.

Mr. WITHERS. It is very plainly stated, I will reply to the Senator from Illinois, in the report of the Commissioner, so far as regards the check. It is because this money is paid not in currency but in a check, and as no banks are convenient to the locality where these Indians reside, they will sell their checks to some speculator who will get them at less than half the value probably. So far as the check is concerned, that is the theory of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, I will ask the Senator, because we want the right of this thing, if it is because the Indians are far away from some bank and they might be deprived of the money in some mysterious way? I will ask the Senator if there is any greater protection where the check is for a small amount than where it is for a large amount?

Mr. WITHERS. In reply I will say that in my judgment there is, because there is less inducement for a party to defraud them; and in addition to that, having been once defrauded, if it is paid by installments, when the next installment is due the Indian would have learned wisdom from experience, and would refuse a proposition to which he had formerly agreed.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator say, in the presence of the Senate, that if an Indian is defrauded of his check the Government has thereby paid him, and he has no right to recover?

Mr. WITHERS. I have said nothing of the sort; but I do say that if an Indian sells the check which is given to him for a pension to Tom, Dick, or Harry, for one-third of its face value, he has no right to recover.

Mr. LOGAN. That is very true, if the Indian should sell his check; but if the Indian is a citizen or a soldier, if he is a person, if he has a right to govern and control himself, how are you going to prevent him from selling the check, either a small one or a large one, if he wants to do so? You cannot make any law to protect him from assigning his check. You cannot deprive him of that right. Then what protection do you give him? You give him none. You merely deprive him of a right that belongs to him as a citizen and as a soldier. You deprive him of a right that belongs to him as an individual, as a soldier, as a pensioner; but you do not protect him, because you cannot by any law deprive him of the right of assignment of his check. That the Congress has no power to do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I understand this amendment, from the discussion and the statements, the history of these particular Indians, or these Indians in general for whom with other soldiers this appropriation is intended, is that they were members of what are called the independent civilized tribes or five nations, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And that they raised a regiment.

Mr. INGALLS. A brigade, three regiments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A brigade of three regiments of Union soldiers, who fought to preserve the unity of the country that they served, and met with the accidents and misfortunes that belonged to a state of war, and they are entitled to pensions under the general laws exactly by the same right and in the same way that other soldiers of the Union armies have become entitled to pensions by acts of Congress. If that is the correct statement of the case, I for one am unable to vote to retain this clause in the bill. It appears to me that they have a legal and untrammeled right, the law having passed and they drawing their pension, to take their pensions like their fellow-soldiers of whatever race, nationality, or citizenship they might happen to be.

Undoubtedly it may be a misfortune, if we assume that a considerable number of this particular class of soldiers are less capable of taking care of themselves than other classes of soldiers. I do not know that to be true. I cannot presume it to be true. It is too true in all cases that a considerable number of those brave men who fought the battles of their country and on the side that they believed to be right, are of such simple and unsuspicious minds (like a great many other people I know, some of them in the Senate, from my particular part of the country) that they are easily imposed upon. Their instinctive faith in human nature and in the rectitude of their fellowmen is so great that they are very apt to be taken in. But we cannot help it. We must give to every man his right under the law and in the way the law has promised he should enjoy it. If it be a misfortune as to some of these Indians that they are likely to be defrauded of their money after it is paid to them, it is a misfortune that it appears to me we cannot attempt to remedy without doing a greater wrong and violating a greater principle, by saying that they shall take their money under a kind of guardianship of the United States.

While I entirely sympathize with the object that the committee have in desiring to retain this proposition, it appears to me that, measuring the considerations on both sides, it is better that they shall bear whatever of misfortune there may be in paying them the money that is justly their due in the risk of losing afterward than it will be to assume this kind of guardianship, and put them on a different footing from all the other soldiers of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 25; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WITHERS. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk, to come in after the second section of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia will be reported by the Secretary.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me that that amendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. LOGAN. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. TELLER. I raise the question whether the amendment is in order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. We cannot tell whether it is or not until we hear it read.

Mr. TELLER. I think we have heard enough.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps the last part of it is in order.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the reading.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment, which was to insert as additional sections of the bill the following:

SEC. 3. That there shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, in each of the congressional districts, a pension examiner, who shall be a person learned in the law, and of not less than five years' experience in the practice of his profession. He shall also appoint, in each of said districts, a pension surgeon, who shall have had not less than ten years' experience in the practice of his profession: Provided, That the examiner and surgeon in each district shall be adherents of different political parties: And provided further, That when two or more contiguous districts are situated in a city or other densely populated locality, or when the number of pensioners and pension claimants in contiguous districts is comparatively small, and the Commissioner of Pensions shall be of opinion that a less number of examiners and surgeons than one of each for each congressional district is required, the number of such examiners and surgeons may be reduced by appointing one of each to perform the duties hereinafter prescribed for two or more districts. The examiners and surgeons provided for by this act, before performing any duties thereunder, shall take and subscribe the oath prescribed by section 1756 or by section 1757 of the Revised Statutes, as the circumstances of each person so to be appointed shall render proper for his case. Said examiners and surgeons shall hold their offices at the pleasure of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 4. That the pension examiners and pension surgeons to be appointed under this act shall be authorized to administer oaths to pension claimants and witnesses in any matters pertaining to the prosecution and settlement of claims for pension and bounty-land warrants, or in any inquiry in relation thereto, and, under instructions and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Pensions, shall take the declarations and testimony of pensioners and claimants and of witnesses in such claims. The pension surgeon shall make a medical and surgical examination of such pensioners and pension claimants as he may be required by the Commissioner of Pensions to examine, and make report thereon. The testimony taken by the examiners and surgeons shall be reduced to writing, as nearly as may be in the language employed by the deponents, and shall be subscribed and sworn to by the witnesses. The examiners and surgeons shall together visit each county seat in their respective districts, as often as three times in each year, unless otherwise directed by the Commissioner of Pensions, for the purpose of performing the duties prescribed by this act, and shall also, for the same purpose, visit such other places in their respective districts, from time to time, as they shall be directed by the Commissioner of Pensions to visit; and whenever any pensioner, claimant, or witness, whose presence before the examiner or surgeon is necessary to the proper determination of a matter pending before the Commissioner of Pensions, shall, because of illness or disability, be unable to travel to an appointed place to appear before the examiner and surgeon, the Commissioner of Pensions may direct one or both, as the necessities of the case may seem to require, to visit such pensioner, claimant, or witness, as the case may be, and take such disabled person's testimony, or make the required medical examination, and the Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to detail from time to time clerks in his office to aid the examiner and surgeon in any district in the performance of their duties under this act when, in his judgment, the exigencies of the service require such aid, and the person so detailed shall have power to administer oaths and examine witnesses.

SEC. 5. That in case medical examinations of pensioners and pension claimants, or the testimony of any witnesses, are required, which cannot well be made or obtained, or which it appears to the Commissioner of Pensions are unnecessary to be made or obtained in the manner provided in section 2 of this act, the same may be made or obtained in such other manner as the Commissioner of Pensions shall direct; and he is hereby required to make convenient rules and regulations for the making of such medical examinations and for the obtaining of such testimony, and to that end may designate any surgeon convenient to the pensioner or claimant to make the medical examination, and any officer authorized to administer oaths, convenient to the proposed witnesses, to take such testimony, notice of time and place of taking such testimony having previously been given to claimant.

SEC. 6. That the Commissioner of Pensions is hereby authorized and required to provide by suitable regulations for organizing and convening boards of three pension surgeons in each pension district, to which appeals may be taken by any pensioner or pension claimant who may feel himself aggrieved by the examination of a single surgeon.

SEC. 7. That declarations in pension and bounty-land claims may be made before any pension examiner or pension surgeon, and also before any magistrate, notary, or other person authorized to administer oaths for general purposes.

SEC. 8. That if any invalid pensioner shall think his pension is not commensurate with the degree of his disability, either because it has been improperly rated by the Commissioner of Pensions, or because the disability for which he was pensioned has increased, or because he has another disability incurred in the service for which he is not pensioned, he may apply to the Commissioner of Pensions for an increase of his pension, and said application shall be considered and determined in the same manner as his original application, so far as such proceedings may be applicable to his case. And the Commissioner of Pensions shall cause an invalid pensioner to be examined by a surgeon as often as he shall deem it for the interests of the Government or of the pensioner; and if upon such examination it shall appear that the pension enjoyed by the pensioner is not according to the degree of his disability, the same shall be readjusted and rerated according to right and justice: Provided, That in cases where the increase is granted for the reason that the disability has increased since the pension was last rated by the Commissioner of Pensions, such increase shall commence at the date of filing application therefor: And provided further, That all applications for increase, on the ground that the pension has been improperly rated, made more than one year after such alleged improper rate was fixed by the Commissioner of Pensions, shall be treated and settled as in the case of increase claims on the ground of an increase of disability.

SEC. 9. That if, after a pension has been allowed, the Commissioner of Pensions shall have good cause to believe that the same has been procured through fraud or misrepresentation, or for any other reason is of opinion that it ought not to continue, he shall cause the case to be investigated by the examiner or surgeon, or by both, acting together, of the district where the claimant or witnesses reside, after first giving reasonable notice to the pensioner of time and place of such intended investigation; and the claimant or pensioner whose case is being investigated may be present at the examination of the witnesses upon such investigation, and may produce witnesses in his own behalf.

SEC. 10. That section 4776 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows: "The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to appoint a duly qualified surgeon as medical referee, who shall have been in the active practice of medicine and surgery for at least ten years, who shall perform such duties in the adjustment of pension claims as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Pensions. His salary shall be $2,500 per annum."

SEC. 11. That the following fees shall be paid to pension examiners, pension surgeons, and other surgeons, and magistrates for services rendered under the provisions of this act in pursuance of the directions of the Commissioner of Pensions: Taking a declaration in a pension or bounty-land claim, including preparation of the same when required, fifty cents; for examining any witness, and reducing the testimony to writing, fifty cents; making a medical examination of a pensioner or pension claimant, including the taking of such statement from the person examined as shall be required by the Commissioner of Pensions, $2.50; actual traveling expenses, and an amount in addition, to be fixed by the Commissioner of Pensions, not exceeding $3, for visiting disabled pension claimants or witnesses as provided in section 2; to members of boards organized under the provisions of section 4 their actual traveling expenses and $3 per day each for the time actually in attendance upon such boards. Such of the above fees as the Commissioner of Pensions may allow shall be paid by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the Commissioner of Pensions shall approve no bills for fees except upon the receipt by him at his office of the testimony and reports showing the performance of the services, accompanied by triplicate bills showing in detail each service for which charge is made.

The Secretary of the Interior shall embody in his annual report a detailed statement of the expenditures under this act during the fiscal year, which shall contain:

First. The names and residences of all persons to whom any money has been paid for services rendered within the year, and for what services.

Second. The names and residences of examiners and surgeons appointed, or who resigned or were dismissed within the year.

Third. The number of meetings and the places thereof of boards of surgeons and the number of examinations made by them.

Fourth. The whole number of pensioners and claimants, respectively, examined by the pension surgeons and by other surgeons.

Fifth. The whole number of pension claims settled by admission and rejection, respectively.

Sixth. Such other matter as he may deem necessary for a full understanding of the operations of the Pension Office under this act.

SEC. 12. Sections 4744, 4771, 4772, 4773, 4774, 4775, and 4777 of the Revised Statutes are hereby repealed, to take effect June 30, 1880.

Mr. TELLER. I raise the question of order now upon the amendment. It is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado raises the question of order that the amendment is not in order, under Rule 29, the Chair presumes.

Mr. TELLER. Under Rule 29.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Is that question debatable?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not until decided by the Chair.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask for the reading of the rule to which the Senator refers as making the amendment out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not in order; but he will submit the question to the Senate. The question is whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, which has just been reported by the Secretary, is in order under Rule 29 of the standing rules of the Senate. The rule will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

29. No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill; nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto; and all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and be decided without debate; and any amendment to a general appropriation bill may be laid on the table without prejudice to the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Under which clause of that rule is the point of order raised?

Mr. LOGAN. Under the first clause.

Mr. WITHERS. Whatever may be the decision of the Senate upon the point of order, I can only say that if this amendment be not in order, then we have violated this rule of order in a very large number of instances in the passage of almost every appropriation bill which we have enacted. I concur very nearly with an opinion which I heard expressed by a distinguished presiding officer of large experience, that the question of order is one which is generally determined by the views of the body, and that an amendment on a bill is regarded as being in order if it meets the approval of a majority of the body; while if they do not favor it, it is generally ruled out of order.

I wish to say a very few words in reference to this bill itself, and the reasons which prompted me to offer it as an amendment to the pending appropriation bill. These reasons grow out of the admitted necessity of some improvement in the present method of adjudicating pension cases. We all know that under the existing system the accumulation of cases which are now awaiting decision by the Pension Bureau is so great as practically to amount to a denial of justice to honest claimants of pensions.

That is an admitted fact, and if it need a demonstration it is found in the fact that there are to-day nearly three hundred thousand cases non-adjudicated lying in the Pension Bureau awaiting the decision of that bureau, some of which have been there for years. We have the official assurance of the Commissioner of Pensions that with all the increase of force which can be contributed it will be impracticable for him to determine more than 25,000 cases per annum under the most favorable circumstances, and that this number cannot after a year or two be possibly reached.

Assuming 25,000 as the largest number which can be adjudicated, without allowing for any new claims that may be presented, it would take twelve years to pass upon those which are now before that bureau.

If we take into consideration the additional fact that where the records of the Adjutant-General's Office do not show the service of the soldier, as they do not in a large number of instances, parol evidence is required to be furnished not only of service but of the time of disability, and when the Surgeon-General is incompetent to furnish evidence of the character and nature of the disability the delays are increased probably 50 per cent., we may safely assume that with the whole amount of clerical labor which can be applied to the solution of these questions and the securing of evidence, it must be more than twenty years before an adjudication of these cases can be had.

With this brief statement of the condition of business in the Pension Bureau, I assume the necessity for some radical change in the present method of ascertaining and adjudicating the rights of pensioners. We have the assurances of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions for several years, certainly for four years or more, that the present system is burdensome to those who are engaged in administering it, unjust to pensioners and unjust to the Government, inasmuch as no adequate protection exists against fraudulent claims, the testimony being wholly ex parte in every one of these cases. To-day we have a pension bill which appropriates $50,000,000 to the payment of this class of claims. I undertake to assert here to-day that the Government is not protected in the slightest degree against frauds for the payment of the whole of this vast amount of money. A collusion between two or three parties only can present a claim to the Commissioner of Pensions for a pension which is so perfect in all its parts that it will not challenge investigation and it will be passed upon favorably, and ex necessitate rei. Surely, then, it is the part of wisdom for Congress to devise some method by which this great danger can be averted, and by which the claims of pensioners themselves can receive that fair, impartial, and prompt consideration which their services to the country so richly entitle them to expect.

The provisions of the bill which I have just introduced as an amendment to the pending pension bill are the result of laborious action by the Committee on Pensions. They have labored earnestly and zealously for years to present to the Senate some system by which the admitted evils of the existing system can be to some extent corrected. We do not presume to hope that the provisions of the amendment are such as will commend themselves to the favorable consideration of every Senator, nor do we claim that it approximates perfection, but we do believe that it is a step in the proper direction, and that if the system for which it provides is put into operation the Government itself will be protected to an amount which I will not undertake now to specify against fraudulent claims, and that the claims of bona fide and honest pensioners will be facilitated immeasurably by the adoption of the system. It is therefore in the interest of the honest pensioner and of the Government alike, and the only classes of persons who are injured by it will be the dishonest pensioners and the dishonest claimants, whose facilities for fraudulent claims will be very much curtailed if this amendment should become a law, and the pension-claim agents who throng around this city and have been lobbying so actively for so many months to defeat the passage of this bill.

It will be readily understood by Senators who have paid any attention to the character of the memorials and petitions which are daily presented that there are, perhaps I might say, two machines in operation intended to influence the decision of this body upon the bill which has just been moved as an amendment. The pension claim agents of this city appeared before the Committee on Pensions when this bill was under consideration. They were granted a full and free hearing, and for days occupied the attention of that committee in arguments against the provisions of this bill. Every facility was afforded them of representing their side of the question, but when it is seen that if this bill were to go into effect they become at once insignificant in the prosecution of a claim; when gentlemen who came before us and claimed to represent 40,000 pension claims recognized the fact that if this bill should be passed Othello's occupation would be gone, and that the opportunity of erecting palatial residences in our cities on the profits derived from such business would no longer exist, it is not remarkable that they should oppose—they would be more or less than human if they did not oppose—with might and main the enactment of a provision which would interfere so seriously with their business and with their profits.

What has been the consequence of this activity? Blank forms of petitions have been circulated all over the country far and wide to every correspondent that they had, and they come up here every morning from the East and from the West, from the North and from the South, and no matter how widely separated may be the localities from which they hail, every one of them has precisely the same phraseology. Every one of these petitions, therefore, has emanated from the pension agents of this city or others interested with them in perpetuating the existing condition of things.

Now, I would call attention to the fact that there have also been presented many counter petitions from parties and organizations of soldiers who declare that they had previously signed a petition remonstrating against the passage of this bill because they had not examined it, but subsequently having an opportunity of examining the provisions of the bill, they are satisfied that it is beneficent in its purposes and that its effects will be most beneficial to the pensioners themselves, and therefore they ask that the bill shall pass. I could, if it were necessary, read by the hour from such correspondence, which is furnished me, but I do not think it necessary, because every one must readily perceive that the interest of these gentlemen is against this bill, and that the whole of these petitions, which would appear to be the spontaneous action of the soldiers of the last war, are not really their spontaneous action, but are manufactured for the occasion.

The provisions of the amendment which I have suggested are, in fact, with one slight modification, identical with those of Senate bill No. 496, reported from the Pensions Committee to the Senate some time ago and which has been placed on the desks of all the members. An elaborate report, embodying the argument in favor of its adoption, has been furnished to the Senate, and is within the reach of every Senator.

I merely call attention, therefore, to these facts as indicating, in my judgment, the necessity for some action in this direction being taken at this time, because there is little probability of our being able to secure the passage of Senate bill No. 496 as an independent proposition at this late hour of the session. Now, when we all recall the fact that some of the most important political legislation which this country has ever known has been ingrafted on appropriation bills by the party on the opposite side of the Chamber, when we recollect the fact that the rule has never been allowed to stand as an insuperable obstacle in the face of the then majority of the Senate whenever any political legislation was desired to be ingrafted into our code, it seems to me the objections come with less force than they would if the gentlemen had been uniform and consistent in their opposition to legislation on general appropriation bills. I know that both sides of the Chamber have committed themselves against it time and again; I know that both sides of the Chamber have declared that the practice was pernicious, and that it should not be any longer countenanced or encouraged; but when I recall to your recollection the additional fact that this is no political legislation, that no partisan legislation is embodied in it, that no party is to receive any benefit from it, that the object is to promote the general good of the whole community, of the country, of the Government, and of the pensioners, and that at the same time it will be a protection to the Government which requires protection, a protection to the Government employés, a protection to the Treasury, I say if we are not mistaken in our ideas as to the scope and effect of the passage of this bill, these great benefits will be secured to the Government and to pensioners alike, and I respectfully submit that the Senate would err much less by permitting this amendment to be ingrafted upon the pension bill, and thus secure action upon it in the Senate, than they would to refuse to consider it and suffer the existing condition of things to go on for an indefinite period without any possibility of rectifying it.

If any plan had been suggested, or can be suggested, which is preferable to this, I am ready, for one, to say that I shall sustain it. I have no special desire to see the provisions of this bill pass excepting to the degree that they will afford relief from the present evils under which we suffer, and it is admitted, so far as I know, by all parties that the existing system is one which cannot furnish relief to the pensioners or protection to the Government.

I have thought it my duty as the mouth-piece of the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, to say this much upon the merits of the proposition which I have submitted to the Senate, being well aware of the fact that my remarks are perhaps not germane to the question of order, but I desired certain facts to go before the Senate and before the country in this connection.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, I have listened with some pleasure to the chairman of the Pensions Committee, and agree with him to a very considerable extent in his remarks. There are some figures and facts that I think the Senate ought to know in connection with this bill. I believe fraud ought to be hunted down and punished, let it come from where it may, and I feel very confident from the examination I have given this question from time to time, and from that which other Senators more competent than myself have given it, that there are frauds to a great amount in the matter of pensions. I have some figures, taken principally from the official reports of the Commissioner of Pensions, to which I will call the attention of the Senate.

The number of pensioners on the roll June 30, 1880, was 250,802; number added to the pension-roll during the fiscal year 1880, 19,545; net increase of the pension-roll during 1880, 8,002. The amount paid for regular pension-roll, 1880, was $37,046,185.89; amount paid for arrears of pensions, 1880, $23,914,194.86; average amount paid each pensioner on regular roll, $103.34; average amount paid each person under the arrears-of-pensions act of March 3, 1879, $560.15. The Secretary of the Interior informs us that there is a deficiency for the current year amounting to $18,282,306.68, and we have just added that amount to the pension bill for the present year. The Commissioner of Pensions estimates that for the next year and for years to come it will take to pay pensioners on the regular roll per annum at least $50,000,000. On June 30, 1880, there were on file 282,597 unsettled pension cases; deduct for duplicate and rejected claims 30 per cent., (being claims now pending,) which will leave 187,318. The estimated amount to pay each pensioner or of each claim for pension under the arrears act as estimated by the Department is $1,025, making a total of $192,000,847.

It will be seen from the above estimates that it requires to pay the pension cases now pending $192,000,847, and annually for years to come fully $50,000,000, and no man can tell but that it will require double that sum; in fact some estimate that it will require more to pay arrears of pension than to pay our national debt. It will be recollected by the Senate that when the arrears-of-pension bill was under discussion the estimates were very much less than it appears now to take; so that the estimate that is now being made by the Department may yet be far under the real figures.

Claims for pensions have until recently come in at the rate of three or four hundred per day. There were 141,466 applications for pension filed in the Pension Office during the fiscal year 1880.

I call the attention of the Senate to the following table:

| Year. | Total number of applications filed. | Total number of claims allowed. | Number of pensioners on the roll and the amount paid for pensions, with the cost of disbursements. | | | |
| | | | Invalids. | Widows, &c. | Total. | Disbursements. |
| 1861 | ..... | ..... | 4,337 | 4,299 | 8,636 | $1,072,461 55 |
| 1862 | 2,487 | 462 | 4,341 | 3,818 | 8,169 | 790,384 76 |

| 1879 | 57,118 | 31,346 | 138,615 | 104,140 | 242,755 | 33,780,526 19 |

It will be seen by reference to this table that in 1874 the number of applications for pensions was 16,734. In 1879 the arrears-of-pensions act passed, and in 1880 the number of applications for pensions was 141,466. Very suddenly the number of applicants was increased from 16,734 up to 141,466, in the short space of six years.

The number of claims examined and allowed in 1874 was 10,462; in 1880, 19,545. In 1860 there was paid for pensions but $1,100,802; in 1870, $27,780,811; in 1878, $26,844,415, showing that the pension-roll had commenced to decrease from 1870 to 1878, but in 1880, after the arrears-of-pensions act was passed, the amount paid was $57,240,540, showing a very sudden increase again.

We pay as much for pensions in one year as in the first fifty years of our history. These figures are taken from official reports, and show that the pensions now cost us more per annum than the entire expenses during the first decade of our Government, and more than the net expenses of the United States in any one year (including all wars) previous to 1856.

| Kentucky | 78,660 | 70,348 |
| Kansas | 20,097 | 18,654 |

It will be seen by the above table that the total number of men furnished by all States was 2,653,062; total men, reduced to three years' service, furnished was 2,129,041.

It has been between sixty and seventy years since the war of 1812, and there are now on the pension-roll nearly thirty-five thousand pensioners of that war, about ten thousand of which are survivors. The rest are widows and dependants, and it costs between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 per annum. There were perhaps ten times as many persons engaged in the late war as there were in that of 1812. If this estimate is correct, and I think it is, we shall for the next sixty years be paying an average per annum for pensions of about forty million dollars, making a grand total of about two billion four hundred million dollars, which is more than our national debt now is, and about as much as it was at any time during the late war.

I hear some Senators laugh, Mr. President, but these are the figures.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator that I was not laughing at what he was saying; but, if he will allow me, I will ask him a question.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. With pleasure.

Mr. LOGAN. He is multiplying now and finding out how much we shall pay sixty years from now.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No, that was not my statement.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, during the coming sixty years.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I gave the average based on the pension-roll now for the war of 1812.

Mr. LOGAN. I should think that was a very fair estimate, if all these people would live sixty years. There is no question about that. They are generally at least thirty-five or forty now, and some of them older. That kind of computation is so perfectly absurd to me—I do not know how it is to the gentleman—that it is enough to make almost anybody laugh.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Absurd as it may be to the Senator's mind, the fact is that there are 10,000 people now on the pension-roll who were in the war of 1812, and it is nearly seventy years since that war. That is the fact as taken from the pension-rolls. I put the average at $40,000,000, and it is well known that we are paying now perhaps twice that much. The Senator and other Senators laughed when persons in the Senate told them, when they were about to pass the arrears-of-pensions act, that it was going to cost fifty or sixty million dollars. There was a laugh then, and there were persons who said that it was absurd; but to-day the laugh is on the other side, and they find there is not so much absurdity about it, though nobody raised the figures as high as the actual facts are, notwithstanding my friend's laugh. These figures may not be pleasant to the Senator, but they are facts, and the tax-payers have to pay the money.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator need not talk about this being pleasant or not pleasant to me. I have said nothing about his figures except as to the sixty years these men are to live after they are forty years old. I did not make it necessary that they should live that long; it was the Senator himself.

Mr. BLAINE. I think I was a little responsible for what seemed to be laughing at the remarks of the Senator from West Virginia. While I do not disagree in the main with the figures of my friend, I do not think we need disturb ourselves about what the 150,000,000 people in the United States will have to pay sixty years hence. I was telling the Senator from Illinois of a gentleman who told me that he never counted anything as liabilities that did not fall due in a week. [Laughter.] So this Government need not count anything as a very pressing liability in the way of pension that is to be paid sixty years hence, when the population of to-day in this country will be trebled, and probably the wealth will be tenfold as great as it is now. At the same time I beg to say that I do not disagree with my friend from West Virginia in the estimate he makes as to what may fall due at that time. I think he is quite correct.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am glad the Senator agrees with me as to the tables; but ought we to entail such heavy responsibilities on the 150,000,000 people that my friend from Maine talks of? Let us provide for the obligations of the present; but do not let us be providing for saddling upon the future payments to such an extent. We ought to take care of the tax-payers to-day, and they will take care of themselves hereafter.

I base my estimate upon the results of the act pensioning soldiers of the war of 1812. If the facts were not just as the Commissioner reports them or if the figures were not so, I could hardly believe there were 10,000 people living to-day who were in the war of 1812; and yet there are that many survivors of that war upon the pension-roll. I could hardly believe that there were 25,000 living widows of soldiers of the war of 1812, and yet the facts show it, though it is nearly seventy years since the war ended.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to remind him of one thing in regard to these computations which seem to be accepted in their mathematical proportions; and that is that the existing pension laws in reference to the war of the rebellion grant pensions only by reason of disability, while the pension laws in reference to the wars of earlier times apply almost entirely in consequence of the mere fact of service, and pensions have been extended to those who were the relatives and connections of those soldiers, and to those soldiers who contracted no disability and consequently have survived until the present time. Unless we change the pension laws of the country it will be utterly impossible that there shall be such enormous aggregations of payment in the future as the Senator indicates.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think my friend is mistaken in saying that we put upon the pension-roll persons who are relatives. That is not my understanding.

Mr. BLAIR. We put on the widows.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Commissioner of Pensions tells us in his report that there are of actual survivors of the war of 1812 ten thousand.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator must know that any actual survivor who was in the service fourteen days in the war of 1812 is entitled to a pension and that of those who contracted disabilities in the war of 1812 probably there are not to-day three hundred men surviving.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is one of the questions whether they contracted disabilities or not. I believe to-day there are more men improperly upon the pension-roll, who are as able as you or I to earn a living, than there are survivors of the war of 1812. I believe to-day there are a great many pensioners upon the roll who contracted no disease whatever, but who have improperly and fraudulently in many cases gotten there. We are told by the Commissioner, and I think at one time we were told by the former chairman of the Committee on Pensions, the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] who is always careful in his statements, that he believed five or six million dollars was annually paid out to fraudulent pension claimants, and the Commissioner of Pensions now estimates that there is in the neighborhood of five or six millions or 10 per cent. of the entire amount fraudulently and improperly paid. Hence the necessity of some such bill as the one now pending. Although I have not examined this carefully, and I cannot say that I approve of all of its features, I am sure that if some such bill can be passed and go into effect, this Government will save five or six millions a year from fraudulent pensions and punish frauds in many cases.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I should like to ask the Senator a question right there. If he thinks or if the Commissioner of Pensions states to the country that he is paying five or six million dollars of fraudulent pension money, will the Senator please explain to the Senate why the Commissioner paid it if he knows it is fraudulent pension money?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is just what this bill wants to find out; and that is just what the Committee on Pensions now are trying to pass the bill for, to find out.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator cannot get out of it in that way. I say that if the Commissioner of Pensions reports that he pays five or six million dollars of pension money that is fraudulent, he cannot make that report if it is truthful unless he knows of the fraud, and if he does he is a dishonest man.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Neither the Pension Commissioner nor myself knew of the fraud. I said it was so estimated.

Mr. LOGAN. Upon what does he estimate if he does not know the frauds? Here under the statute he has a right to cut off any pensioner any moment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. We understand that; but whenever a bill or an amendment is offered to cut them off in wholesale if they are there, there is some opposition to it from some quarter. I am not referring to the Senator from Illinois for I do not know that he opposes it.

Mr. LOGAN. I am opposed to it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I did not know it.

Mr. LOGAN. You know it now.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am sorry to know it, for I believe that it is his duty and mine to hunt down pension frauds and punish them, and not allow the tax-payers to suffer from them.

Mr. LOGAN. I will not allow the Senator to put me in such a position, for I am as ready to hunt down frauds as anybody; but I say that a man who makes a report that he pays five or six million dollars annually fraudulently is a dishonest man unless he knows some fact to base it on. He has no right to state it unless he knows the fact. He has no right to pay the money fraudulently, and if he does he should not state the fact unless he can show it to be so. I say that no such argument as that is a fair argument in favor of a bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I remind the Senator that neither the Commissioner of Pensions nor myself stated that we knew the fact to be so.

Mr. LOGAN. If you do not know the fact, you should not state it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is the Senator's opinion; but I have an opinion, and I have the right to state what I believe.

Mr. LOGAN. I say if there is a pensioner on the roll who is receiving his money fraudulently, it is the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions, under the law, to cut him off from the list.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is just what we are trying to do by this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I beg the Senator's pardon. We shall see whether you are trying it or not. When you stand in the Senate Chamber and say that money is paid to men fraudulently, before accusing the soldier who receives it dishonestly, you should know what you state to be a fact.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Now I must take the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. You should give us some evidence. Let us have some evidence.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. We have heard thunder before to-day, Mr. President, but generally there was more in it than there is to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. I will only say to the Senator that he has heard thunder and so have others, but the thunder never came from his quarter.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am willing to take what the Senator says, but I do not want the Commissioner to be judged improperly. The Commissioner has made the estimate, and so far as I know he is sustained by the Secretary of the Interior, for the report comes to Congress saying what his estimate is. I know nothing of frauds myself. The Pension Commissioner does not say that he knows of them; but that is his estimate of their amount, and it is not only his estimate, but as I say the Senator from Kansas stated that he believed after examination that it was not far from correct, not that particular statement, but that there was a large amount in his judgment. I understand also that the Pensions Committee generally believe there are a great many frauds that this bill would remedy and cure. This is the reason why I am for passing this or some measure to prevent frauds and hunt them down and punish them. I would rather spend a million dollars to hunt out fraud and punish it, than to pay one-tenth of it to fraudulent claimants, and I think it would be cheaper for the Government to do it.

From the beginning of our Government to 1865 the entire or total amount paid for all pensions did not exceed $90,000,000, or an average of a little more than a million a year. We appropriated all that was estimated or asked by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions for the current year, but the payments have so far exceeded their estimate that they send us a special message asking for a deficiency of eighteen or nineteen million dollars for this year. We are now paying about double as much per annum for pensions as all the rest of the world.

When the arrears-of-pensions bill was under discussion in the Senate some Senator said it would cost but a few millions; others twenty or thirty millions; I believe none estimated above thirty or forty millions. We now find that it will require several hundred millions.

I find by referring to the record of the vote on the arrears-of-pensions bill, March, 1879, that but four Senators voted against its passage, viz: HEREFORD, McCreery, SAULSBURY, and DAVIS of West Virginia.

Mr. President, we have upon our table a communication from the Commissioner of Pensions dated the 20th instant, in which he reviews the pension-arrears act of 1879, and gives in detail the reasons, facts, and figures upon which he bases his estimate, and concludes as follows:

| Amount of arrears to old pensioners | $25,293,963 66 |
| First payment of pensioners to July 1, 1880 | 8,821,826 09 |
| Arrears in pending claims | 192,000,847 50 |
| Annual pensions to 125,000 new pensioners | 284,185,000 00 |

This amount is directly chargeable to the arrears-of-pensions act, and does not include the regular pension-roll as it existed before the act of March 3, 1879.

The Commissioner of Pensions estimates $50,000,000 to pay the regular roll for the current year, and thinks it will increase until it requires $60,000,000 annually to pay the regular roll. The Commissioner also estimates that under the present system of paying and examining pension claims, 10 per cent. of the amount paid is upon fraudulent claims—this would be $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 per annum—and upon the total estimate of the cost of the arrears-of-pensions act, more than $50,000,000. These figures are startling, yet the present system is continued from year to year and but little effort is made to find and punish the guilty.

Mr. President, I am in favor of paying all who are justly entitled to pensions. I think fraud should be hunted down and severely punished whenever found. We should use every safeguard possible to protect the Treasury and tax-payer. I think every man who was wounded or disabled in the United States service ought to have a pension; but I object to a wholesale expenditure of the people's money to persons who are not entitled to it. Many are to-day receiving large pensions who are as well and as able to earn a living as a majority of this Senate or the people of this country.

The Commissioner of Pensions tells us there is in his opinion 10 per cent., or about five million dollars, annually paid to persons who are not entitled to it, and he asks us to give him such legislation as will protect the honest pensioner and punish the dishonest. I am for it. We ought to protect alike all persons justly entitled to a pension and the tax-payer.

I believe it to be the duty of the Senate in some manner to put a stop to the large amount of money paid annually to pensioners who are not entitled to it. It is believed by a great many people that a fair and proper examination would develop these immense frauds. I know that some persons think they are very much less than they really are. We hear much about soldiers and the danger of talking against soldiers. No man has heard me say one word against soldiers; no one has heard me say a word against a pensioner that is justly entitled to be on the pension-roll; but I do intend to say a great deal against those who are fraudulently and improperly receiving pensions, if there be such, and it is believed by many that there are, and if there are we ought to pass some bill that will cut them off and prevent a repetition of the abuse. The law should be such that no man can get on the pension-roll till there is proper proof that he is entitled to be there.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am unfortunate sometimes, especially when I get into a colloquy with my very genial and kind and generous friend from West Virginia. He talks about thunder. I have heard him make that speech before. It is not new to me. He made the same speech to me once before, and I did not then understand it because it was, in common and vulgar parlance, "very thin" to come from a Senator who is a great mathematician, who is certainly entitled to much credit for the mathematical accuracy with which he has demonstrated many propositions before this country. I have been very much surprised at the argument made by the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from West Virginia. If you put the two together, although the latter was trying to enforce the former, I can demonstrate I think that the arguments will not hang together. The Senator from Virginia says that he wants this bill passed to facilitate the pensioners' business. I do not misstate him when I say that. He says that claim agents are opposed to it. Now, if this bill is for facilitating of the pensioners' business and the obtaining of pensions, why should pension agents oppose it?

Mr. WITHERS. It deprives them of their profits.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not understand that and cannot see it. The trouble is they get no profits unless the pensions are allowed; and if pensions are not being allowed the profits are not derived.

The Senator from West Virginia says that if the pensions are allowed it will cost the Government an excessive amount of money. Now, the Senator from Virginia says he wants to facilitate the obtaining of pensions, and yet the Senator from West Virginia says it will cost an enormous amount of money to the tax-payers of this country. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia if he is for this bill and it will advance the interests of the pensioners, why does he undertake to demonstrate this enormous amount that it will cost the people?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator give way?

Mr. LOGAN. I will certainly give way to the Senator to explain.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am for this bill or any other bill that will punish the fraudulent pensioners and give those justly entitled to pensions their money.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the reason, is it?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is the reason. My desire is to reach those who are receiving pensions dishonestly, if there be such, and I believe there are. I want to reach the dishonest ones; the honest ones I want to pay.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, the Senator says he is in favor of this bill because it will reach fraudulent pensioners. If that is the merit of this bill, why all this array of figures showing the amount of pension money the people have got to pay? Has that anything to do with the argument for detecting fraudulent pensioners?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think it is a good bill; and the necessity of passing this bill or some other to prevent the payment of a part of this money itself to fraudulent persons is shown by the figures representing our present expenditure.

Mr. LOGAN. Then how will it prevent frauds? The Senator does not know that there are fraudulent pensioners; he cannot demonstrate how this will prevent fraud, how it is going to do it; and let me call his attention and that of the chairman of the Pensions Committee to one thing. Under the law as it exists to-day the Commissioner of Pensions has the right to have any pensioner in the United States examined by a surgeon at any time he sees proper. Is not that true? The Commissioner has the right to send a special agent, a special deputy of his, to examine any pensioner in the United States, no matter where he lives, at any time. That is the law. The Commissioner may appoint additional surgeons for examinations. That is the law now. He may appoint additional inspectors, if you may call them by that name, to examine pensioners. That is the law now. The Commissioner of Pensions may suspend any pensioner on the roll. That is the law. He may stop any pensioner receiving his money. That is the law now. Then, tell me how it is that you want a law with more power to stop frauds than exists now? If the Commissioner has power to suspend any pensioner, has power to re-examine him, has power to take new evidence, has power to send a special agent to examine him, to bring him before a surgeon for examination, tell me what more power you desire should be committed to his hands for the purpose of detecting frauds?

With all the power that can be given to a man under the laws of the United States that Commissioner is to-day empowered to detect fraud, to dismiss pensioners, to have them re-examined anywhere, at any place, by surgeons appointed, and to appoint additional surgeons, to appoint additional inspectors; and with all this power you say he cannot detect fraud. Why, sir, give me that power and I will ask no Congress to pass a bill to enable me to detect fraud.

The trouble is not in the dishonest pensioners; it is not because of their intention of obtaining money fraudulently. The trouble is that the head that administers the law is not competent for it. There is the trouble, sir. Make a man Commissioner of Pensions who has ability to administer the law as it is written in the statutes, and you will have no necessity for any amendment to your pension law.

The Senator from Virginia thought he had made a great point when he said that pension agents were hovering around this Capitol. No pension agent has ever spoken to me, nor would I allow one in any way to influence me in my action in reference to this question. I was sorry that he brought that into this argument; that does not look like high and elevated argumentation when a man wishes to lug in some little thing outside to affect a bill, and talks of pension agents and claim agents! I have heard that before; it has no terrors for me, sir.

But Senators talk about petitions being sent out by claim agents. Ah, sir, petitions have been sent out on both sides. I will not say by whom on the side that the Senator advocates, but equally as dishonorable a performance as the one on the other side if what he states is true. I will not dabble in the dirty waters of claim agents or any of the mud stirred up by the Commissioner of Pensions in order to either advocate and advance this bill or to defeat it.

What is the effect of this bill? Not to benefit the soldier, not to protect the Government. What do you do? You appoint in this bill a board of surgeons in each district. You have surgeons there now. If they are not competent, turn them out and put in others. You have a surgeon in almost every county. In nearly every county in my State the Pension Commissioner has appointed examining surgeons, and in the city of Chicago there is a board of examining surgeons, and all gentlemen who stand as high in the medical profession as any men in this nation. So it is all over the country. The surgeons are multiplied where necessary under the law as it now exists, even down to counties, to examine pensioners; and yet frauds cannot be detected. Whose fault is it, I ask? Is it the fault of the law? It is not the fault of the law but the fault of the administration of the law.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. What would the Senator have the head of the Pension Bureau do? Would he have him send a special agent to examine every one of the 240,000 pensioners now on the roll? Is that what he proposes to do?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir, because I would not suspect the 240,000 of being dishonest men.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Neither does the Commissioner of Pensions suspect that the 240,000 are dishonest men, but he does suspect that some of them are dishonest men. It is not possible for him to know who is dishonest and who is not dishonest. He can send a special agent to examine a pensioner, but he does not usually send that special agent until he has some information that there is occasion for it.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to read a few words from the report of this committee?

And when it is remembered that under the system now in force the Commissioner is not authorized to send out agents to search for fraudulent cases, but must wait until reasonable suspicion has attached to a case before he can order an investigation, it will be seen that the discovery of these frauds must be left mainly to accident, and therefore that the frauds discovered are probably very few in comparison to the whole number which exist.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If I may be allowed to say one word further I will add that I have been personally acquainted with the Commissioner of Pensions for twenty years and upward. The Senator is of the opinion that he is not competent to administer the powers of the bureau. I think he is competent not only to administer the powers of that bureau, but to administer the powers of the Department of the Interior or even to be President of the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, I have no reply to make to that.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The reply is that in your opinion he was not competent to discharge the duties of his position.

Mr. LOGAN. I repeat it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very well; I have made my statement.

Mr. LOGAN. I say that the Commissioner of Pensions who, under the law as it now exists, will have a suspicion of fraud without knowing that there is fraud, is not competent to administer the law.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If he knew fraud he would not have any suspicion of it; he would know it as a fact.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I will answer the Senator from Wisconsin, and the paragraph the Senator from Connecticut read, and I will be obliged to him if he will read it again.

Mr. PLATT. I will read a little more than before.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; read what you choose.

Mr. PLATT. I want to read what I read before in this connection:

Referring to fraudulent claims—

shows that under the present system enormous sums of money are being drawn from the Treasury through fraud by persons who are not entitled to pensions, and that many perjuries and forgeries are committed in pension claims; and when it is remembered that under the system now in force the Commissioner is not authorized to send out agents to search for fraudulent cases, but must wait until reasonable suspicion has attached to the case before he can order an investigation, it will be seen that the discovery of these frauds must be left mainly to accident, and therefore that the frauds discovered are probably very few in comparison to the whole number which exist.

Mr. LOGAN. You are advocating what this bill proposes because this Commissioner has asked it to be passed. Are all the pensioners to be examined by the board that he is to appoint under this law? Is that what you propose? You ask me if I would examine the two hundred and forty thousand. Do you propose to do it under this law? It affords no more facility for the examination than does the old law. Then if you do not propose the one, why ask me if I propose the other?

In reference to the proposition made as to suspicion of fraud, how do you propose to detect it? Do you propose to call every pensioner before this board and re-examine his case? Is that the object? It does not purport to be its object, and if it is not, what then? How are you to detect the fraud any more easily than under the laws that exist? The Senator from Wisconsin asked me if I would send examiners all over the country. Why, your present Commissioner has done that. In my own State he has sent his clerks as special agents, and they have gone all through the country examining pensioners to see whether they were guilty of swearing falsely or not.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It seems, as he construes the law, he had the right to send special agents.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course he has the right. That is what I am saying.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. You are saying more. He construes the law in this way: he has the right to send a special commissioner when there is a reasonable suspicion that fraud is being perpetrated upon the Government in a particular case.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. He has a right to send them to examine any pensioner in the United States that he chooses.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will you refer to the statute giving that right?

Mr. LOGAN. I will refer to the statute. I assert it to be the law, and I can refer to it, too.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. He construes the law differently.

Mr. LOGAN. Section 4774 of the Revised Statutes reads:

The Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to organize, at his discretion, boards of examining surgeons, not to exceed three members, and each member of a board thus organized who is actually present and makes, in connection with other members or member, an ordered or periodical examination, shall be entitled to the fee of $1, on the receipt of a proper certificate of such examination by the Commissioner of Pensions.

SEC. 4775. Examining surgeons duly appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions, and such other qualified surgeons as may be employed in the Pension Office, may be required by him, from time to time, as he deems for the interests of the Government, to make special examinations of pensioners, or applicants for pension, and such examinations shall have precedence over previous examinations, whether special or biennial; but when injustice is alleged to have been done by an examination so ordered, the Commissioner of Pensions may, at his discretion, select a board of three duly appointed examining surgeons, who shall meet at a place to be designated by him, and shall review such cases as may be ordered before them on appeal from any special examination, and the decision of such board shall be final on the question so submitted thereto, provided the Commissioner approve the same. The compensation of each of such surgeons shall be $3, and shall be paid out of any appropriations made for the payment of pensions, in the same manner as the ordinary fees of appointed surgeons are or may be authorized to be paid.

SEC. 4776. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to appoint a duly qualified surgeon as medical referee, who, under the control and direction of the Commissioner of Pensions, shall have charge of the examination and revision of the reports of examining surgeons, and such other duties touching medical and surgical questions in the Pension Office as the interests of the service may demand; and his salary shall be $2,500 per annum. And the Secretary of the Interior is further authorized to appoint such qualified surgeons (not exceeding four) as the exigencies of the service may require, who may perform the duties of examining surgeons when so required, and who shall be borne upon the rolls as clerks of the fourth class; but such appointments shall not increase the clerical force of said bureau.

Then, in reference to the agents, he has the same power to appoint agents for the purpose of going over the country and examining pensioners, and does it, and they go into counties and send for pensioners, bring them up and examine them.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. They only bring up and examine those whom they suspect.

Mr. LOGAN. And whom would you examine? That is exactly what I am talking about. If he has the power to examine those who are suspected now, what more power do you give this board that you want to appoint? He has the power now, and you do not want the board to go calling for every pensioner in the United States to examine him. I presume you only want a board to examine those who are suspected. He has that power now, and he exercises it; hence I say that is the power he has now. If he does not exercise it and stop frauds, it is because he is not qualified to execute the law.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me? He is discussing a question that profoundly interests a very large number of people in at least two-thirds of the States of the Union. I think that his remarks ought to be listened to by a full Senate, and a fresh and not a tired Senate. If he will give me leave to do so, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator allow me one moment to refer to the statute under which the Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to appoint special agents?

Mr. THURMAN. I greatly prefer that the Senator should postpone it until we all come in fresh to-morrow.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It will only take a moment, and I wish to use it in connection with what the Senator from Illinois has been saying.

Mr. LOGAN. I will put it in in the morning.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will put it now if I am permitted to do so.

Mr. THURMAN. I will change my motion at the suggestion of Senators and move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) Before putting the motion the Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the President in reference to the removal of the Ponca Indians, inclosing several documents.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I desire to read section 474, by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the message be read.

Mr. DAWES. Let it be referred to the select committee on the Ponca investigation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We always read messages of the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will be read.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Before the message is read I desire to read section 474 of the Revised Statutes. I think no one will object to that:

The Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to detail, from time to time, any of the clerks in his office to investigate any suspected attempts to defraud the United States, in or affecting the administration of any law relative to pensions, and to aid in prosecuting any person implicated, with such additional compensation as is customary in cases of special service. Any person so detailed shall have the power to administer oaths in the course of any such investigation.

Mr. LOGAN. That is just what I said the law was.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. As I understood the Senator, it is just exactly what he did not say; if it is otherwise, I misunderstood him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not necessary to read it to-day. I move that the Senate do now proceed, before the message begins, to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 1, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. There will be no prayer this morning in consequence of the absence of the Chaplain. He was not notified of the change to an earlier hour of the meeting of the House, and therefore no blame is to be attached to him.

Mr. McKENZIE. I understand the reading of the Journal will take three-quarters of an hour, and therefore I move it be dispensed with.

Objection was made.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has notified the Chair the Committee on Commerce desire, by unanimous consent, to have the privilege of sitting during the sessions of the House until after the completion by that Committee of the river and harbor appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOYCE. I ask, by unanimous consent, to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 1805) for the purpose of putting it on its passage. The bill has already passed the Senate providing——

Mr. COBB. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. O'NEILL. Oh, withhold the demand for the regular order for a little while.

Mr. JOYCE. The special Committee on the Yorktown Celebration has considered this Senate bill and unanimously agreed to its passage.

Mr. COBB. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman from Indiana might give way for an hour this morning. It would do no harm, and might enable the House to clear the Calendar of some bills which ought to be passed.

Mr. JOYCE. Let the gentleman from Indiana wait a moment until we can pass the bill to which I have referred.

Mr. DUNNELL. There is no quorum present.

Mr. TALBOTT. There are many bills upon the Speaker's table which ought to be disposed of at once.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to go to the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order at this time, but will be hereafter.

Mr. COFFROTH. Then I move by unanimous consent to submit the motion.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. COX. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to amend that by providing we shall proceed to call up bills for the purpose of giving relief to some individual people of the country.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be amended. The question is on the motion to dispense with the morning hour, which requires a two-thirds vote. The Chair is of the opinion that two-thirds have not voted in the affirmative.

Mr. COX. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 20.

Mr. FERDON. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and Mr. COX and Mr. FERDON were appointed.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 126, noes 19.

Mr. FERDON. I do not demand any further count.

So the motion was agreed to, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move now to go to business upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XVI, clause 9. At any time after the expiration of the morning hour it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue or general appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The motion to go into committee takes precedence of the motion to go to business upon the Speaker's table. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COFFROTH] asks that by unanimous consent the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COBB. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. That is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. COBB's motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. CONVERSE in the chair,) and proceeded with the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last evening the pending question was on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] to strike out the paragraph which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For maintaining the jail: For one warden, $1,800; one physician, $1,000; deputy warden, $1,100; three guards, at $1,000 each; fifteen guards, at $900 each; one engineer, at $1,000; one assistant engineer, at $900; four firemen, at $800 each; one messenger, $700; two cooks, at $420 each; in all, $27,040.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For subsistence, $13,800; fuel and lights, $3,000; beds, bedding, and clothing, $2,500; medicines, medical stores, delicacies for the sick, and disinfectants, $500; stationery, blank books, and blanks, $150; forage for horse and cows, and repairs to wagon and harness, $500; furniture, hardware and tinware, cooking-utensils, dishes, night-tubs, and cell-buckets, $1,000; preparing for execution, $200; ice, soap, and sal soda, $200; miscellaneous articles, $300; in all $22,150: Provided, That hereafter the officers of the Reform School, jail, and insane asylum shall at the end of each fiscal year make report to the commissioners of the District of Columbia: And provided further, That hereafter the officers of each of the institutions appropriated for in part out of the revenues of the District shall embrace in their respective reports a full and complete inventory of all the personal property in detail, the number of employés, and number of days each is employed during the year and price paid each, and the amount of garden and field products produced at each of said institutions, together with the disposition made of said personal property, products, &c.

Mr. COBB. The Committee on Appropriations recommend an amendment on line 130, after the word "make," to insert the word "a."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the following charities, namely:
For relief of the poor, $10,000.

Mr. BARBER. I move in line 141 to strike out "ten thousand dollars" and in lieu thereof to insert the words "twelve thousand six hundred dollars, and out of the same amount the sum of six thousand six hundred dollars is hereby set apart as a fund for the payment of physicians employed to treat the poor."

Mr. COBB. I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COBB. It is antagonistic to Rule XXI—section 3 of that rule. It increases expenditures.

Mr. BARBER. It makes no change in the existing law.

Mr. COBB. There is no law for the provision which the gentleman seeks to incorporate into this bill.

Mr. BARBER. This appropriation makes no change, however, in the existing law. It merely increases the amount of the appropriation for the relief of the poor of the District.

Mr. COBB. But the amendment specifies how it shall be expended.

Mr. BARBER. But there is no law regulating the expenditure of money for the relief of the poor in the District.

Mr. COBB. You propose here to make a law providing how $6,600 of it shall be expended.

Mr. BARBER. But we certainly have a right to direct how the appropriation shall be applied, and that is to secure a certain sum of money to pay the medical force which is employed for the relief of the poor of this District, and to give them suitable compensation. As the gentleman from Indiana said yesterday, there are over twenty thousand paupers in this District, and probably he spoke within bounds in fixing them at that number. As I understand it, there are some eleven physicians employed by the District board who treat this number of paupers, and they receive the pitiful sum of $30 per month each for services of much greater value. My amendment simply increases the appropriation to the extent of $2,600, and sets apart a sufficient sum to enable the board, if they think proper, to employ physicians at a monthly salary not exceeding $50 a month. I think the point of order is not well taken, and the amendment ought to commend itself to the judgment of the committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order is well taken. We have existing at this time a statute providing that no contract shall be made except where an appropriation has been fully authorized by existing law. Now, there is no legislation of that kind to authorize this change. It is impossible that such a contract can be made at this time, because it is unlawful. The proposition of my friend is therefore one that looks to a change of that legislation which prohibits a contract to be made where there is no law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken as the amendment stands. If the gentleman from Illinois shall strike out from this amendment that part which refers to the manner in which this $6,600 shall be expended by the board, the sense of the committee can be taken upon the question of increasing the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. BARBER. Very well, then, I will do that; I will modify the amendment, trusting to the good sense of the commissioners as to the mode of expending the fund.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment as modified by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 141 strike out "$10,000" and insert "$12,600," so that if adopted it will read, "for the relief of the poor, $12,600."

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 31.

Mr. BARBER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COBB and Mr. BARBER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 43, noes not counted.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Industrial Home School, $10,000, $5,000 of which shall be used for building a house on the premises, under the direction of the commissioners of the District of Columbia. And hereafter the commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to visit and investigate the management of and have a report of the receipts and expenditures of all the institutions herein appropriated for.

Mr. HUNTON. I offer an amendment, to come in at the end of that paragraph.

Insert, after line 159, the following:
"One of said commissioners, to be selected by the board of commissioners, shall be a member of the board of managers of the Industrial Home School, with all the powers, duties, and privileges of the other managers of said school."

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 47.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL EXPENSES.

For salaries and contingent expenses:
For executive office: For two commissioners, at $5,000 each; one secretary,

$2,100; one clerk, $1,500; one clerk, $1,400; one messenger clerk, $900; one messenger, $600; one driver, $480; for contingent expenses, including printing, books, stationery, and miscellaneous items, $3,000; in all, $20,040: Provided, That the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia shall hereafter be entitled to the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel of engineers.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I make the point of order upon the proviso appended to that paragraph. It changes existing law and increases expenditures.

Mr. COBB. I trust the gentleman will not insist upon the point of order. I wish to say in regard to this matter that this proviso is simply in the opinion of the committee an act of justice to this commissioner. Two of these commissioners are paid now $5,000 a year. This gentleman for whom provision is made here is a detailed Army officer; detailed expressly for this duty. I can say from my own knowledge of the duties that he performs more actual service than either of the other two commissioners.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. The gentleman is discussing the merits of the proposition, and not the point of order.

Mr. COBB. I know very well if the gentleman insists upon the point of order that it is well taken, but I hope he will not insist upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken and sustains it.

For old-records division: For one clerk $1,200; one clerk, $900; in all, $2,100.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 196, insert "for special assessment division: One clerk, $1,800; one clerk, $1,400; one clerk, $1,200; contingent expenses, including books, stationery, and miscellaneous items, $100; in all, $4,500."

Mr. COBB. I make the point of order upon that amendment upon the ground that there is no general law establishing the offices which this amendment provides for.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like for the gentleman from Indiana to blow either hot or cold, and he might take his choice. Yesterday he maintained that the law was in the appropriation bill for the current year. Now he says this is subject to the point of order because there is no general law. The appropriation for the current year provides for the assessment division; and more than that, the Secretary of the Treasury has estimated for it.

I have before me the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, which I will read for the benefit of my friend from Indiana. Yesterday he was making the fight for the Secretary. To-day he is making it against the Secretary. Yesterday he rested his point of order on the ground that the present appropriation made the law. To-day he says this amendment is subject to a point of order because it is in the appropriation bill for the current year. The gentleman must be wrong upon one point or the other; I leave him to decide on which.

The appropriation bill for the current year provides for the assessment division just as my amendment provides for it. The Secretary of the Treasury makes the estimate for it as necessary for the carrying on of the duties of the District government. Here is what the Secretary says:

Special assessment division, $4,200.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I hope the gentleman from Virginia does not mean to advise the committee that the Secretary of the Treasury has made any recommendation other than by allowing this amount to remain in the bill.

Mr. HUNTON. I am stating exactly what the Secretary says, and the gentleman from Rhode Island can draw his own conclusions. I will read what the Secretary says on the subject. Addressing the District commissioners, he says:

GENTLEMEN: By section 3 of "an act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia," approved June 11, 1878, it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to carefully consider all estimates submitted to him for the expenses of the District of Columbia, and to approve, disapprove, or suggest such changes in the same, or any item thereof, as he may think the public interest demands; and, after such consideration, to cause to be made a statement of the amount approved by him, and the fund or purpose to which each item belongs, which shall be certified by him and delivered, together with the estimates as originally submitted, to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall transmit the same to Congress.

Pursuant to this duty, the Secretary returns herewith the estimates submitted by you for the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, with his approval, as follows.

And then follows what I read a moment ago—

For special assessment division, $4,200.

So that it is not only provided for in the existing law but is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury as necessary. I desire now to call the attention of the committee to what I had read from the Clerk's desk yesterday.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman will allow me a moment—he has admitted I was right half the time, which is a strong admission in my favor—I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HUNTON. It is a good thing for the gentleman that he is right half the time.

Mr. COBB. I could not admit that much for the gentleman from Virginia in his treatment of this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUNTON. Now on the merits of the case, the point of order having been withdrawn, I proceed to state that the special assessment division in the District government has been in existence ever since I have known anything of that government. It was estimated for by the commissioners whose estimate was approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and it is, as I am informed by the District commissioners, essentially important to continue this division of the Government. From the chief of the division we have a letter, a portion of which only I will read, the whole of it being in the RECORD of this morning:

The revision of the assessments on streets and avenues has been completed, but a large amount of work remains to be done before the office can be closed.

There are one hundred and sixty-six alley assessments in a state of partial revision.

The claims for revision filed in 1878, 1879, and 1880 are not yet all examined and reported upon.

Lien certificates have yet to be prepared and issued upon one hundred and sixty-six streets, and also the one hundred and sixty-six alley assessments.

The accounts of Mr. George W. Beall, late clerk in charge of the collections on account of special assessments, since 1871 to July last, should be reconciled with the books of the treasurer of the board of public works and the commissioner of the sinking fund.

The old records in this office are valuable, and should be properly cared for and filed; and the current work is by no means insignificant, and covers every conceivable form of complaint.

So that in the view of the commissioners, in the view of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in the view of the chief of that division, it is necessary to continue this portion of the appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order having been withdrawn, the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. In view of all the facts and circumstances which surround this case, facts which are as familiar to the gentleman from Virginia as to myself, I am greatly surprised he should ask that this appropriation be inserted in this bill.

When the District appropriation bill was before the District Committee last year they called the attention of the commissioners to the fact that we were called upon to appropriate a very large sum for salaries of executive officers, a sum larger, I believe, than that appropriated in any city in the country of the same size, and a larger sum than is appropriated in several of the States for salaries of similar officers. In the District appropriation bill last year we appropriated over one hundred and sixty thousand dollars for salaries of executive officers, not including fire, police, and the school departments. This bill appropriates $160,000 for similar purposes. The only city whose reports I have had a chance to examine since last night is the city of Buffalo, of about the same size as this; and I find that they appropriate $80,000 for the same offices. In my own city of Providence, with a population of 105,000, we expend but $53,000 for these officers.

When we called the attention of the commissioners to this condition of things they alleged as the principal reason for these large expenditures the revision of special assessments which had been ordered by Congress. They stated to the committee that this revision would be completed in a few months, and after it was completed they proposed of their own volition to recommend to Congress to reduce the appropriation for these executive offices. In June, 1879, when the last act was passed for making revisions the commissioners stated to the committee that the revision could probably be completed within three months, that is, by the 1st October, 1879. They have been before Congress or the committee three or four times since for the purpose of having the time extended and making promises that the revision should be completed within a few months. They fixed the time in April last. Again, they fixed it in July. By a communication which I have before me and which I will not take up the time of the committee to read, they fixed it in October. They finally fixed it in January of this year. In their report sent to this House in December last they say:

The revision of special assessments required by the acts of 19th June, 1878, and 27th June, 1879, will be completed by January 1, 1881, and will be made the subject of special report.

Now, what do we find this morning? The revision of special assessments having been completed, we find the gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, urging this appropriation and giving as a reason for it a letter which he produces from the very man whom we propose to legislate out of office, giving his reasons why he should be retained, and why his salary should be continued.

I believe this course is an unusual if not extraordinary one. This officer says, in a letter which the gentleman from Virginia has read, that the revision is complete to-day, but he desires to be retained in his office for another eighteen months for the purpose of performing other duties. In my opinion, after careful examination, many of the duties suggested cannot properly be performed by this gentleman.

He proposes to revise his own acts, apparently to go over this work indefinitely. The appropriation bill for the current fiscal year provides for the continuance of these officers for six months. I believe, and I think every member of this committee will agree with me, that this revision could have been completed in six months' time, instead of being extended over three years.

What has been the result of this revision? It has reduced the amount of taxes due to the District for special improvements one and three-fourth million of dollars, and a large portion of this reduction has been in violation of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say a few words in answer to the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALDRICH.] I am as much an advocate of economy in the affairs of the District of Columbia as he is. I would be very glad to reduce the expenditures of the government of this District, but I do not think that the government is liable to all the criticisms which the gentleman has made upon it. That gentleman knows as well as I do that since the new form of government for this District went into operation under the law of June 11, 1878, the expenditures of this government have been greatly reduced. One thing, twenty-eight inspectors of water have gone out of office. I might enumerate other reforms. Now, I cannot understand why the gentleman from Rhode Island should sit in his seat and see all the other officers of the District government provided for without making any effort at reform in any division of the government until we come to the special assessment division. He seems to want to make the whole reform in that one division, to wipe out that division entirely. The commissioners of the District of Columbia themselves say that it is important to retain that division, and as evidence of its importance they give a letter which they called upon the chief of that division to write.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] criticises me because I ask to retain this division in the District government upon a letter written by the chief of that division. I ask it at the instance of the Secretary of the Treasury and at the instance of the District commissioners. And the District commissioners, as evidence that it is necessary, produce from the records of the division, as furnished by the chief of the division, a statement of what is to be done in that division. There is nothing unusual in that.

If reform be necessary, if further economy should be introduced into the affairs of the government of this District, it should be extended all through the divisions of the government, and not aimed at one single division alone, which, in the opinion of the officers of the District government, is important for the proper discharge of the duties and functions of government imposed upon the commissioners.

I say to this Committee of the Whole that the District commissioners with one voice claim that this division is important for the proper prosecution of the functions of the government of this District. As evidence of that they furnish a letter which I have read to the committee. The Secretary of the Treasury supervised the assessment for this division, which was sent in by the District commissioners, as I have read from a letter of the Secretary himself. In face of all this, it seems to me there is no reason why this division of the District government should be stricken down.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of replying to the statements of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON.] I agree perfectly with him that this reform ought to be extended through all the departments of the District government. The excuse given by the District commissioners heretofore for this large expenditure has been that the revision of the special assessments was going on, and until that was completed there could be no reduction of any magnitude One reason why I favor the striking out of the appropriation for this special assessment division is that its functions have ceased and there is no reason why it should be continued.

Mr. HUNTON. My friend from Rhode Island will certainly bear me out in the declaration that there are special assessments constantly going on in this District.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Not by any means.

Mr. HUNTON. I beg your pardon.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. There is no authority of law and there has been none since June, 1878, for the levying of any special assessments in this District, and I defy the gentleman from Virginia or any other gentleman on this floor to point me to an act of Congress authorizing any such assessment.

Mr. HUNTON. I can do it.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. It cannot be found. The act of June 11, 1878, I think, specially forbids the levying of any special assessment after that date for any improvements. If any have been made it has been in violation of law. The provision in relation to complaints being filed before the commissioners expired a year and a half ago; and if any complaints are made now they are made without authority of law, and certainly there should be no department for the reception of unauthorized complaints.

The gentleman undertakes by implication to assert that the Secretary of the Treasury has approved the retention of this appropriation. I admit that formally he has done so; but I know of my own knowledge, and I state it without hesitation, that the Treasury Department is in favor of striking out this appropriation; and that it has only been retained by an inadvertence.

Mr. HUNTON. Why did the Secretary of the Treasury recommend it?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. It must have been overlooked by the Treasury Department, as I know that the officers of that Department are in favor of striking it out. They know as well as I do that the only effect of retaining it must be to give places to some four or five officials. In the letter which has been read no reason is given for the retention of the appropriation.

Mr. HUNTON. Did the Secretary of the Treasury tell the gentleman that he wanted this appropriation stricken out?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I did not say that; I said the Treasury Department wanted it stricken out.

Mr. HUNTON. We do not look to the Treasury Department; under the law of 1878 we look to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. For the information of the gentleman, I will say that the Treasurer of the United States made precisely the statement I have given.

Mr. HUNTON. But he is not the man who makes recommendations to us; it is the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. The gentleman from Virginia knows as well as I know that the Treasurer is the man at the Department most familiar with the workings of this portion of the District government.

Mr. HUNTON. We can only look to the recommendations of the Secretary himself—nobody else.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I will admit that the Secretary of the Treasury has made a formal recommendation to this House; the gentleman is entitled to the benefit of all that the fact may imply.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it not true that these estimates for the salaries of particular officers are made simply because those officers are in existence, and the recommendations do not imply any opinion as to the importance of the duties that those officers perform?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Certainly.

Mr. HENKLE. Mr. Chairman, every one desires to see the expenses of this District retrenched, and there are no members of this House who are more anxious for that consummation than members of the District Committee. But it is known to every intelligent member of the House and to every citizen of the District that the condition of affairs existing here for the last ten or fifteen years has been unlike that of any other city of the whole country. In the wild, reckless career of a District government that was organized many years ago, the whole town was upturned from center to circumference. Streets were graded and regraded; grades were changed; property was depreciated in value, and in some cases its value was utterly annihilated. In hundreds of instances citizens were bankrupted. Special assessments were laid upon property when the value of the property was actually destroyed by what was claimed to be an improvement. These assessments were grievous and oppressive, and in many cases amounted to a confiscation of the property. Redress was sought at the doors of Congress year after year without any relief. Finally, in 1878, a bill was passed extending relief to those who had not yet paid their special assessments, but no relief was given to those who had, in dread of legal proceedings, paid their assessments, enormous though they were. Afterward another bill was passed extending relief by drawbacks to those who had paid their assessments.

Now, this work extended over the whole city. It involved in its adjustment an examination and revision of the special assessments of the entire city—all the improvements that had been made here during that reckless reign of ring rule in the District of Columbia. Such a confused, chaotic condition of public affairs has never been known in the country as existed right here in the District of Columbia. The work of revision was a herculean task. It was impossible for the clerical force in any office to do it within a limited time. The officers of the District have worked diligently at this business; they have worked with ability, and the gentleman at the head of this department is the peer, and I believe the superior, of any man in that sphere of business within the limits of this District. He is in reference to matters of this sort a perfect encyclopedia—a man thoroughly familiar with all the details of every department under his charge. These officers have labored all the time faithfully and efficiently, but the work is not completed. In the nature of things it could not be completed within the time thus far allowed. The commissioners in sending their estimates to the Treasury Department have regarded it as necessary that this work should be continued for a while in order that it may be finished. The Treasurer has examined the question carefully and seriously, and he has sent in his report to Congress saying that it is necessary to continue it.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Has the gentleman read the letter which the chief of the special assessment division sent to the chairman of our committee, the letter in which he says that the work of revision of assessments of streets and avenues has been completed?

Mr. HENKLE. I have not.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. It might be well enough for the gentleman to read that letter.

Mr. HENKLE. But the gentleman, as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, knows that complaints are coming to us every day with regard to the grievous nature of these special assessments, and he knows that they have not been fully adjusted.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. The gentleman from Maryland knows as well as myself that any special assessments now being made are unauthorized.

Mr. HENKLE. The special assessments are all the time going on.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. HENKLE. I know as much about it as the gentleman.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. NEAL. I renew the formal amendment. Mr. Chairman, I have been disposed to be as liberal with this District government as any member of the District Committee; but it has seemed to me that the offices of this District government needed a thorough and complete revision. I believe there are more employés than are required to do the necessary work of the government; and when we considered the District appropriation bill last session I was assured by one of the commissioners that they would reduce the expense of that government at least 25 per cent. There is no reduction in this bill whatever. If I wanted to provide a government for this District, with my knowledge how municipal affairs should be governed, I would do away with other officials besides those whom it is now proposed to do away with.

Now, what are the facts? There were assessments made upon the property of individuals known as special assessments for particular improvements. These assessments were made years and years ago. Complaints were made from time to time of those assessments. Finally, in order to allow persons who had any right to complain, to have their special assessments revised, we passed a law for the revision of those special assessments under the District government.

One of two things is true: either we must pass a law wiping out all these special assessments or there must be some end to this revision. As has been well stated by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALDRICH,] the law which authorized these revisions has expired by the terms of its own limitation, and therefore there is now no authority for it whatever.

It is true we have complaints made before our committee daily, by persons who do not wish to pay these special assessments, that they are exorbitant and unreasonable in their character, but the fact that these assessments have not been revised before has been because the parties themselves have not presented their cases to the board of revision.

I believe this system of taxation is the most iniquitous ever invented by man to extort money from the people. The pretense under which it is made is that it is an improvement to the property commensurate with the amount of expenditure. That, however, is untrue in almost every particular. We have a law of that kind, as you are well aware, Mr. Chairman, in Ohio. It is limited to 25 per cent. of the value of the property. Formerly it was unlimited. I remember one instance in which a distinguished citizen of Ohio, William M. Corry, had his property assessed by the city council of Cincinnati. The improvements were made and the property was sold, but sufficient was not realized from the property itself to pay the assessment after the improvements had been made, and the city council brought suit against Mr. Corry to compel him to pay out of his other property this assessment which had not been liquidated by the sale of the improved property itself. This bears me out in the statement that the system itself is iniquitous.

Besides, sir, it has been most unjust in its character in this District, as any one who is familiar with the District itself knows. Persons of means and influence have had special assessments for improvements upon their property revised, and they have received payment for damages, while those who had no one in court to look after their interest have had their claims unattended to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. NEAL. I will withdraw the amendment and renew it for the purpose of continuing what I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the Chair must hold that that cannot be done.

Mr. HUNTON. The gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Rhode Island have spoken to the committee about the economy in the District government. I agree there ought to be any amount of economy exercised, but it strikes me as peculiar the two gentlemen should direct their economy exclusively to one division of that District government, and that division which has been in existence for the last eight or ten years, certainly ever since I have been in Congress, and ever since these special assessments began, which was a long time ago, and which has the same powers provided for in this amendment that it had I believe from the beginning.

Both of the gentlemen talked about the completion of the revision of the special assessments as the reason for abolishing the division itself. That division existed before. Special assessments are authorized by law, and therefore the completion of the revision of special assessments does not affect the necessity for them at all. When this revision of special assessments was going on, as gentlemen of the District Committee will all bear me witness, there was an immense deal of work to do in that division, more than four times the labor engaged in that division could accomplish, and it was supplied, according to my information, from other divisions of the District government. That special work in revising special assessments is completed, and therefore they will in that division need now only the ordinary force provided for by the amendment.

As I understand the duties of this division of the District government, it is always in operation. Special assessments are always going on. Whenever a new street is opened or a street is improved, a special assessment is made on the property-holders for the purpose of paying for it, and that special assessment goes to this division of special assessments under the District government. Therefore, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, it is essentially necessary to keep up the special-assessment division in the District government. Although the revision of special assessments has been completed, it is nevertheless a part of the District government which must be provided for.

The Secretary of the Treasury had all these things under consideration, and he revised the estimate of the District commissioners. The fact mentioned by the gentleman from Rhode Island that some man in the Treasury Department, it may be some subordinate who has this matter especially in charge, has told him verbally this might be dispensed with, does not affect the question at all. The law authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to revise the estimates. He has revised the estimates and has recommended the continuation of the special-assessment division at about the rate provided for in my amendment.

I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. COBB. I renew the amendment. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that I have not given this question as careful consideration in regard to its details as perhaps I ought to have done. How the gentleman from Virginia can come here in face of the statement of the commissioners of the District and insist this special assessment shall be continued beyond what is required is something I cannot understand. There are a great many persons employed in these different Departments. I have no doubt they are the friends of gentlemen. I have no question about that. When, however, the commissioners themselves say in their report submitted to this Congress on the 26th of November, or rather published at that date, but submitted on the first day of this session, that this special-assessment division would complete its work by the 1st of January, for the gentleman to insist in contradiction to the commissioners upon keeping up and appropriating for this special-assessment division is something I cannot understand, unless, perhaps, it is to force upon this District the obligation of paying men for performing duties that ought not to be performed.

Mr. HUNTON. The gentleman has no right to make such an insinuation.

Mr. COBB. I do not insinuate anything further than the language I have read conveys.

Mr. HUNTON. The gentleman makes an insinuation that is not warranted by the facts.

Mr. COBB. I repel the intention of making any insinuation other than the language conveys. I will read what the commissioners say themselves.

Mr. HUNTON. Well, read it and see if it bears out the insinuation.

Mr. COBB. I will read it and I wish the gentleman to understand that I will read it without his command.

Mr. HUNTON. I do not ask the gentleman to read it. I simply want him to do justice to my statement.

Mr. COBB. The commissioners say:

> The revision of special assessments, required by the acts of June 9, 1878, and June 27, 1879, but which was interrupted and delayed—> which was interrupted and delayed by the investigation ordered by the House of Representatives during the last session of Congress is still in progress and will be completed by January 1, 1881, and will be made the subject of a special report.

They give the reason why it was delayed. Why was it delayed?—

Now, the gentleman from Virginia proposes to appropriate for one year from the 1st day of July, 1881, and running up to the 1st day of July, 1882, for this service, when the commissioners tell him in plain and emphatic language here that the work of this special assessment division will be completed before that time. If the gentleman can meet that statement now I wish he would do it.

Mr. HUNTON. Will the gentleman allow me? I am sure he does not want to misstate the position of the commissioners. I will show, if he will grant me one moment, that he does misstate it. He says, Mr. Chairman, that the commissioners report that the work of this division is completed, or will be——

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. The only authorized work.

Mr. HUNTON. I am replying to the gentleman from Indiana, now. If the gentleman from Rhode Island will wait a moment I will reply to that. With all respect to the gentleman from Indiana in reference to his construction of the language of the commissioners I beg leave to remark that they say no such thing. But they do say exactly what I have stated heretofore that the work of the revision of special assessments is done. That is all they say; that is what I stated; that is what we all know to be a fact, that the revision of special assessments provided for by law by this Congress or the preceding Congress has been completed. That is the revision of special assessments But further——

Mr. COBB. I cannot yield my whole time to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HUNTON. Simply let me finish the sentence.

Mr. COBB. I prefer to continue in my own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana declines to yield.

Mr. COBB. I have now read what the commissioners say, and the gentleman from Virginia has a peculiar way of getting around language. I cannot do it as nicely and adroitly as he does, I must confess. But I have quoted language which seems to me to be very plain. When the commissioners themselves assent that this work will be completed or that this division will have completed its work by the 1st day of January, as I read, I must confess I take it that their language means exactly what it seems to convey. I will read it again:

> It will be completed by January 1, 1881.

That is, these special assessments or the work of this special-assessment division. That is what they say, and I cannot understand language if that does not mean that the work will be completed at the date fixed. And I can state further, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Virginia who is a member——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted. The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. NEAL. I wish to say in response to the gentleman from Virginia that he is mistaken when he says that the business of making these special assessments for the improvement of property is still going on. There is no provision of law authorizing these special assessments upon property to be continued any longer. All the streets and avenues upon which improvements are being made are made at the expense of the District treasury, and not at the expense of the property adjacent thereto. So that in that respect at any rate there is no necessity for any further special assessments. Moreover, Mr. Chairman, the principle upon which these special assessments has been made is radically wrong. It permits a clerk or chief of division, together with his clerks, to go to work arbitrarily and estimate how much the assessment already made by a competent officer shall be reduced. I am informed at the Treasury by a well-posted gentleman—a person entirely competent to pass judgment upon this matter—that there have been not less than three revisions of special assessments which have been made upon property in this District; and I was shown yesterday two separate assessments for sewerage upon adjacent lots on which the original certificates were $54, while under the late revision one of the lots paid only $18, and the man who paid his $54 comes before our committee and wants us to pass a law refunding to him the money paid in excess of the revision made upon the adjacent lot. As I stated before, one of two things is true: either we should wipe out all special assessments and pay back the money which they have been compelled to pay, or we must stop the revision somewhere. If there is to be any further revision, it should be done, not by a clerk in one of the bureaus, but should be a competent revision by persons fully acquainted with the facts and the value of the property; a jury, if you please, who have the necessary knowledge and judgment to make a revision in such a way that it will be just and equitable, not only to the property-holder, but to the holders of adjacent property in the District.

I think, therefore, that in view of the numerous offices already connected with the District government we can well dispense at least for one year with this board of revision; and I trust the committee will vote to keep the appropriation out of the bill.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say to the committee that if the District commissioners desire the abolition of this special-assessment division, as the gentleman from Indiana construes their language to mean, I would be the last man upon the floor of this House to advocate its retention; but it is singular, if they have made a report in which they say that the work of this division is ended, that they should then come to me to ask me to offer an amendment restoring this assessment commission to the appropriation bill left out by the gentleman from Indiana. If the committee will attend to the language made use of by the commissioners in their report, I believe they will find the gentleman from Indiana is mistaken in his construction of that language. It is to this effect:

> The revision of special assessments required by the acts of June 19, 1878, and June 27, 1879, which was interrupted and delayed by the investigation ordered by the House of Representatives during last session of Congress, is still in progress. It will be completed by January 1, 1881, and will be made the subject of a special report.

Now what will be finished by January 1, 1881? The work of this revision? No; the revision of the special assessments authorized by two special acts of Congress will be finished by that time; but they do not say, and did not mean to say, that the work of the division would be ended by that time; because the work of that division, as I understand, is a continuing work, was in operation before this revision of special assessments was authorized by law, and is still necessary in the opinion of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and is still necessary in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, as reported to this House in the letter which I have read.

The gentleman from Indiana, then, it seems to me, is mistaken in the construction which he placed on the language of the commissioners. If he will examine it more carefully he will see that what they say is that the revision of the special assessments will be completed by the 1st of January; not the work of the revision but that particular work assigned to it by two special acts; and when that is finished then the regular work of the division comes along, which the commissioners say it is necessary to keep up for the purposes of the government.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I will admit that the District commissioners are entitled to be represented as the gentleman claims, but it is only in this way that they have given their approbation to this appropriation for the special-assessment division. But I call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to this singular fact: that although they send here a communication from a clerk whose office is abolished by this appropriation bill, giving some reasons why he should be retained in his position, they do not by word or by implication approve the communication. In fact they express no opinion whatever whether the reasons given by the clerk are good or bad reasons. They have never recommended, since I have been on the District Committee, the cutting down of the salary of a single officer, the abolition of a single office; and I believe so long as they retain their positions they never will.

Now, what are the reasons this chief of the special-assessment division gives why he should be retained in his position for another eighteen months? I submit to the House, and I believe any one familiar with this revision of special assessments will agree with me, there is no valid reason assigned in the communication why he should be retained. He says the tax-lien certificates have yet to be prepared and issued. The assessments have all been made and revised, and to issue the lien certificates is a function of the commissioners themselves, and could not occupy exceeding two or three weeks at the outside.

He says further, the claims for revision filed in 1878, 1879, and 1880 are not yet all examined and reported upon. By the acts of June, 1878 and 1879, thirty and sixty days were given to parties who complained of their assessments to file complaints; and any complaints filed after that were of no effect. The commissioners had no right to take into consideration any complaints except those that were filed within thirty and sixty days respectively. But what have they done? This division which it is proposed to retain has received complaints and revised all assessments to completion without regard to any such limitation; and now they propose to go back and examine the complaints on which the revision should have been based.

He says the accounts of Mr. George W. Beall need examination. I think any gentleman who listened to the testimony taken last winter will agree with me this chief of the special-assessment division is not the person to examine these accounts. They were too closely connected in their relations for this gentleman to be called upon to audit or approve the accounts of Mr. Beall. These accounts should be examined by some one outside of the special-assessment division. Those and the further reason that complaints are still coming in are the only reasons given by the chief of the division for this appropriation.

The pro forma amendment having been withdrawn the question was taken on Mr. HUNTON'S amendment and it was not agreed to—ayes 5, noes 54.

Mr. NEAL. I ask the consent of the gentleman who has charge of this bill to go back to the foot of page 7 for the purpose of adding a proviso which I shall read. If there be any objection to it I will withdraw it.

At the foot of page 7, after the appropriation for the Industrial Home School, is this proviso:

> And hereafter the commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to visit and investigate the management of, and have a report of the receipts and expenditures of, all the institutions herein appropriated for.

I propose to add the following proviso:

> Provided, That the supervision heretofore exercised by the Secretary of the Interior over the Government Hospital for the Insane shall be continued, and the officers of said hospital shall report to him as heretofore, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

The supervision of the Secretary of the Interior ought to be continued.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to going back for the purpose indicated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL?]

Mr. COBB. I have no objection. I think it is the law now, but as the gentleman seems to think there is some doubt about it, and for the purpose of settling the question, I am willing that his amendment should be put in. It is important that there should be no doubt upon the subject.

Mr. NEAL. Then I offer the amendment I have indicated.

The amendment of Mr. NEAL was then adopted.

The Clerk read the following:

> For treasurer and assessor's office: For one treasurer and assessor, $3,000; one assistant assessor, $1,800; one clerk, $1,600; two clerks, at $1,400 each; six clerks, at $1,200 each; one clerk, $900; one inspector of licenses, $1,200; one assistant, $900; one messenger, $600, contingent expenses, including printing, books, stationery, car-fare, detection of frauds on the revenue, and miscellaneous items, $2,000; in all, $22,000.

Mr. FORT. I move to strike out the last line of the paragraph just read for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman in charge of this bill. I notice that the paragraph just read provides for a treasurer, and quite a number of clerks under him, for the District of Columbia. I had supposed that all the money belonging to the District of Columbia was deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, and that there was no treasurer of this District and no need of any. If, however, I am assured there is a necessity for the office, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. COBB. I did not exactly understand what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] was saying; I could not hear it all.

Mr. FORT. I said that I have understood that the Treasurer of the United States acted for, and was in fact the treasurer for the District of Columbia, and that all moneys belonging to the District were deposited with him. This paragraph provides for a treasurer and a clerk, or two clerks, or may be more, under him. If that office is necessary, then all right; if not, it certainly should not be continued. It has come to us no doubt from the old District government, as many other of these unnecessary offices have come, and has been continued from time to time. If this treasurer, with perhaps one, or two, or three, or more clerks can be dispensed with, it is now a good time to do it.

Mr. COBB. I will state that I fully sympathize with the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT.] But he will remember that the law of 1878, organizing a new government for this District, put into the hands of the commissioners of the District the power to regulate these officers, and it made it their duty to remove them, to change them, and so regulate the business affairs of the District as to make the system run smoothly.

That, however, has not been done. I have no doubt at all that these two officers, the treasurer and the collector, have many more clerks than should be provided. But I have talked with the commissioners about it, and they always seem to be opposed to any proposition to reduce expenditures, as stated by the distinguished gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] awhile ago.

I want to state for the benefit of this committee and for the gentleman from Illinois the manner in which these two offices are conducted. There is one officer known as treasurer and assessor and there is another known as collector. Now, it is the duty of the collector under the law, as I claim, and I have examined it pretty carefully, to collect all the taxes and to deposit daily in the Treasury of the United States the revenues which he collects. Instead of that, however, it is done in this way: The officer known as treasurer and asssessor goes on and assesses the property of this District. He retains the books after they have been made up, instead of turning them over to the collector, as I claim it is his duty under the law, taking his receipt therefor and charging him with the amount on the assessment books.

The treasurer and assessor retains the books, and if you wish to pay taxes you must go through a double process. First, you go to the treasurer and assessor's office, and there the assessment books are examined and your tax account made out. Then you must go somewhere else to pay your taxes and take your chance when there is a rush of being able to do it in a reasonable time. The collector takes the account, receipts it, and takes your money, and then sends the money to the treasurer. I say that one of these offices should be abolished, or the rule which they have laid down for transacting business ought to be abolished. It is a cumbrous and extravagant system, and I think I know it as well as any one, for I have examined it carefully. They have got into the way of repeating some of these accounts a half dozen times, at the expense of the Government employing attorneys, &c., when it should be the duty of the individual to employ an attorney if he cannot do it himself. In my judgment it results in great expense to the General Government and without any benefit.

I have an amendment which I had intended to present, but I knew that the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] and I say it in all kindness, would oppose all these propositions, and therefore I have left it out, or the committee did, believing, however, that there is an error in the manner of collecting taxes in this District, and that it is impossible to correct it except by law. I trust that, now attention has been called to the subject by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT,] members will look into this matter in the future and take measures to systematize the affairs of this District, and thereby reduce the burdens now borne by the people of the District and by the public Treasury.

Mr. FORT. I think this would be a very opportune time to do what is suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBB,] but as there is not time, perhaps, to fully mature the necessary provisions, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SAMFORD. It seems to be conceded by the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] that there is no necessity for this treasurer and assessor; and, if not, I see no reason why this provision should not be stricken out of this bill. No reason has been given why it should be retained; and the gentleman from Indiana has just informed the committee that his investigation shows it is superfluous—that there is no necessity for it. Now, as the sum of $22,000 is involved, I think, unless there is some defense for it, the provision ought to be struck out. If no one else will make the motion, I make it myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD,] as the Chair understands, moves to strike out the paragraph extending from line 197 to line 208 inclusive.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I suggest to my colleague on the District Committee, the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD,] that it will be necessary to have some machinery for the assessment of taxes. If this paragraph be struck out, the office of assessor is abolished as well as that of treasurer. The office of treasurer should undoubtedly be abolished; but it is necessary to have some officer who shall make the necessary assessment for taxes.

Mr. FORT. We could readily insert in the bill a provision of that kind.

Mr. HUNTON. In regard to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, my colleague on the Committee on the District of Columbia, I agree that it would be better to abolish the office of treasurer of the District of Columbia altogether and let the collector make his collections and settle with the Treasury Department. But the gentleman from Alabama includes in his motion the striking out of the office of assessor, one of the most important offices of the District government, one without which the government of the District could not be conducted. As one man fills the positions of treasurer and assessor, the employment of additional force in that department is obviated. But I agree that if the office of treasurer were abolished and the collector required to pay the funds collected by him directly into the Treasury, it might and probably would work better than the present system. But the making of such a change would require additional legislation which it would not be proper to put upon an appropriation bill. Hence I suggest to my friend that while these two offices are held by one man and no additional expense is entailed upon the District, we might let the matter remain as at present until a law shall be passed imposing upon the assessor all necessary duties and turning over to the Treasurer of the United States, the sinking-fund commissioner, the duty of treasurer of the District as well as of the United States.

Mr. COBB. As this question has been raised here, I will send up and have read a provision which I think will cover this question. I do not offer it as an amendment, but simply desire to have it read for information. Any other gentleman who desires to move it as an amendment may do so. If adopted as a part of this bill it would be original legislation put upon an appropriation bill, which I object to, except where it is absolutely necessary.

The Clerk read as follows:

The office of treasurer of the District of Columbia is hereby abolished from and after the 30th day of June, 1881, and the collector of taxes for said District shall, from and after that date, collect all revenues of the District and deposit the amounts collected daily with the Treasurer of the United States. The duplicate of assessment for the fiscal year 1882, and annually thereafter, shall be prepared by the assessor before the 1st day of November of each year; and upon the completion thereof shall be delivered to the collector, who shall receipt in duplicate for the total amount of taxes shown by said assessment. The original receipt shall be forwarded to the First Comptroller of the Treasury, and the duplicate to the auditor and comptroller of the District of Columbia. All tax bills shall be made up by the collector of taxes; and he shall be held responsible under his bond for all taxes, except such as he may not be able to collect after fully complying with the requirements of law.

Mr. SAMFORD. The motion which I submitted was made in accordance with the remarks that fell from the gentleman from Indiana. I was not myself apprised as to whether there was any necessity for this officer known as treasurer and assessor. It would seem now that the only objection raised to my motion is that it is a change in the existing system. But it can make no difference whether this officer is called a treasurer and assessor or simply an assessor. If the officer is necessary the provision for the office should not be stricken out. I am now informed by the gentleman from Indiana that the amendment he has had read for the information of the committee would reduce expenses by getting rid of a number of clerks. In view of that statement, I withdraw my former motion and move as a substitute for the paragraph extending from lines 197 to 208 inclusive the provision sent to the desk by the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out the paragraph and insert what has just been read by the Clerk.

Mr. HUNTON. I raise a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. SAMFORD. Is it liable to a point of order when it does not increase expenditures?

Mr. HUNTON. To be in order it must diminish expenditures.

Mr. SAMFORD. It does diminish expenditures according to my information, obtained from the gentleman having charge of this bill.

Mr. HUNTON. There is nothing upon the face of the amendment, as read by the Clerk, which reduces expenditures, according to my understanding; and certainly the provision is a change of existing law. Will the Chair direct that the amendment be reported again?

Mr. SAMFORD. If I may be allowed to modify my amendment, I can put it in such a form as to escape every point of order that may be raised. I will now move to strike out the whole of the paragraph down to and including the words "in all" in line 207, and then to strike out in lines 207 and 208 the words "twenty-two thousand dollars" and insert "eighteen thousand dollars." This amendment will embrace a reduction of expenditures, and the point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia will be obviated.

Mr. HUNTON. I would like to hear read the amendment as modified.

The Clerk again read the provision sent to the desk by Mr. COBB.

Mr. SAMFORD. And my amendment is also to add "and there is hereby appropriated for the purpose of defraying the expenses of said assessor's office the sum of $18,000," leaving it with the commissioners themselves to employ what clerical force may be necessary. It reduces this appropriation to the extent of $4,000. I really think myself it might be made less, but I leave it at $18,000, because I have not examined this matter minutely.

Mr. FORT. The Chair must look to the effect of the amendment and not to the face of it. If it appears the effect is to reduce expenditures, then it comes within the rule.

Mr. COBB. We cannot hear what the gentleman from Illinois is saying, and I hope he will speak louder.

Mr. FORT. I am speaking to the point of order, and I have said the Chair must look to the effect and not to the face of the amendment. If it appears in his judgment the amendment will have the effect to reduce the expenditures, it is clearly in order.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say one word on the point of order. If the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama prevails, if it is ruled in order and adopted, then, according to my understanding of its effect, it will leave all these officers in the appropriation bill at the salaries provided for them. The only provision which the gentleman says looks to the reduction of expenditures in that office is the reduction from $22,000 to $18,000.

Mr. SAMFORD. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that I move to strike out the whole paragraph, from line 197 to line 208.

Mr. HUNTON. Then what do you propose to insert?

Mr. SAMFORD. I propose to insert what the Clerk has read.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask, then, that the Clerk again report the amendment, so we may know what it is.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all from line 197 down to and including line 208, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"The office of treasurer of the District of Columbia is hereby abolished from and after the 30th day of June, 1881, and the collector of taxes for said District shall, from and after that date, collect all revenues of the District and deposit the amount collected daily with the Treasurer of the United States. The duplicate of assessment for the fiscal year 1882, and annually thereafter, shall be prepared by the assessor before the first day of November in each year, and on the completion thereof it shall be delivered to the collector, who shall receipt in duplicate for the total amount of taxes shown by said assessment. The original receipt shall be forwarded to the First Comptroller of the Treasury, and the duplicate to the auditor and comptroller of the District of Columbia. All tax bills shall be made up by the collector of taxes, and he shall be held responsible under his bond for all taxes, except such as he may not be able to collect, after fully complying with the requirements of law. And there is hereby appropriated the sum of $18,000 for defraying the expenses of said assessor's office."

Mr. HUNTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, that amendment abolishes the treasurer and appropriates for an assessor's office a sum in gross. It abolishes all these offices herein enumerated from lines 197 to 208. I suppose it changes existing law, as it certainly does the mode of appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion the amendment does change existing law, but it is in the direction of lessening the expenditures of the Government, and therefore it is in order.

Mr. NEAL rose.

Mr. COBB. Allow me to make a single statement. I desire to say that the amendment which has been proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, and which I sent up to be read for information, was submitted to the Treasury Department, and that Department, after careful consideration, concurred in its propriety. I hold in my hand here the law to which they referred me. After careful examination of that law, I have come to the conclusion that the amendment as applied to this section of the bill will work harmoniously and properly. The next section will have to be amended to conform to it; but that is easily provided for. That is all I desire to say at present.

Mr. NEAL. The Committee on the District of Columbia have given careful consideration not only to the tax laws of the District but all the other laws which have for their effect the management and regulation of its municipal affairs. I am here to confess, when we had this question under consideration of what should constitute the official force of the District, I was unable to see the necessity for a continuance of both the offices of treasurer and collector. I believe the duties of the two offices could be assigned to and discharged by one bureau. I believe wherever we can simplify matters it is our duty to do so.

The committee will recollect that at the last session of Congress we passed a municipal code providing not only for the payment of taxes but for the description of property which should be assessed for taxes and the mode of collecting the taxes. That code is now waiting in the Senate, and I have great hopes it will become a law before the final adjournment of this Congress. If it does, then it will make changes more in accordance with modern systems of taxation. It therefore seems to me this amendment ought not to prevail. If it does not pass at this session, I feel confident the next session will adopt the code, because of the fact that it passed this House with unanimity, and because it has received the indorsement of almost the entire Committee on the District of Columbia in the Senate. I trust, therefore, that this committee will allow the section to remain as it is in the bill until we see what disposition is made of the code next year, after which we will have abundant time to effect that revision of the official force of the District which it seems to me ought to be done sooner or later, but when done should be done in accordance with a system that will not work objectionably under the new code. I trust, therefore, the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I simply desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that it seems to me this city, like other large cities, can make, and ought to make, the treasurer ex-officio collector of taxes. If this is done, it greatly simplifies matters as well as saves expenses in the collection of taxes. All large cities in the Western States, I believe, without exception, as far as my information goes, combine the office of treasurer with that of collector of taxes. It saves the expense of additional officers. It saves a large expense in the collection of the taxes, taking one year with another. These two offices are naturally intimately connected, and there is no reason why they should not be consolidated into one, the treasurer receiving the funds and being ex officio collector of taxes. He receives all of the funds, and the collection of the taxes being in effect one act, would save the expense of an additional officer to the city. Under such circumstances, where it can be made without detriment to the public interests, where, as in the case of a treasurer who shall be a collector of taxes, (and under the law of every Western State he is the collector of taxes in cities as well as towns,) it would save at least the expense of receiving the public money into the treasury, which is a considerable item, if it does not save the expense of paying it out. And that expense in a city like this is a large item. In Chicago and in Milwaukee and other western cities the treasurer collects the taxes. He receives so much for the collection of the taxes and so much for the disbursement of the public moneys which come into his hands in that way.

Mr. NEAL. That mode would make the expense here four or five times as high as it is.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I beg to differ with the gentleman from Ohio. The expenses of collection and disbursement of the taxes is limited; a certain percentage being paid for the collection. One or 2 per cent., as the case may be, for moneys paid in December which are due on the 1st of January, is allowed in some of the smaller towns and a limited amount for paying it out. This mode of allowing a percentage upon the collection and disbursement has been found economical in most of places, and I beg leave to state that I differ with the gentleman in his understanding that if adopted here it would add largely to the expense of this city. It is a saving of money; an economical measure, and not an extravagant mode of collecting.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. NEAL. I merely wish to call attention to one statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, that 2 per cent. is paid for collection. If that system was adopted here it would cost $34,000 to collect the taxes of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I confined or intended to confine my statement in that respect to small municipalities. I think I stated that in small towns the expense was limited to 2 per cent. or even less. In larger ones the collectors receive perhaps one-half or a quarter of 1 per cent.

Mr. NEAL. I want to say this, that there is not a city in the United States in which the taxes are collected as economically as they are in this city.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to strike out the last word. I have two objections, Mr. Chairman, to the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Alabama. I do not object to the abolition of the office of treasurer as connected with the District government——

Mr. HUMPHREY. I wish the gentleman from Virginia would allow me to make a simple correction. I stated that if the office of collector and treasurer were consolidated it would be a saving of expense in the collection of taxes. In the larger cities, to avoid giving too large a percentage to the treasurer for the amounts collected, a salary is fixed, or an amount beyond which his commission should not extend.

Mr. HUNTON. If the office of treasurer is abolished as suggested by the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, it does not save one dollar of expense, because the same officer is assessor, and the same officer is treasurer, and the two are united in one man who receives but one salary. While I would not object to transferring the duties of treasurer of the District of Columbia wholly to the Treasurer of the United States, yet it must be done so as to make a corresponding change in the law which cannot be done, in my opinion, without a special act upon the subject.

Now, my two objections to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama are, first, that it puts it in the power of the assessor who has $18,000 at his command to direct what distribution shall be made of that fund and do what he pleases with it in running his office.

Mr. SAMFORD. His discretion in that direction is limited by the law.

Mr. HUNTON. It puts it in his power to carry on his office of assessor by placing in his hand the gross amount of $18,000, and in carrying on his office to employ one clerk at $2,000, another one at $2,000, another at $3,000 if he please, and so on until the funds are exhausted. Now, that is one of the objections that I have to this amendment. That is a plain deduction from the premises.

Mr. COBB. The general law upon the subject gives the commissioners supervision. This amendment provides a system which they shall follow, and appropriates money in gross to enable the commissioners to carry it on.

Mr. HUNTON. Of course the organic act authorized the commissioners to abolish or consolidate offices. But here there is for running the treasurer's office a gross sum of $18,000; and in that respect it will not matter who runs it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The question being taken on Mr. SAMFORD'S amendment, there were ayes 36, noes 14.

Mr. HUNTON. A quorum has not voted, and I demand tellers.

The chairman ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. HUNTON and Mr. SAMFORD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 67, noes 45.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For collector's office: For one collector, $4,000; one clerk, $1,800; one clerk, $1,400; one clerk, $1,200; one messenger, $600; for contingent expenses, including printing, books, stationery, car-fare, and miscellaneous items, $2,000; in all, $11,000.

Mr. COBB. I desire to make this section harmonious with the other which has just been amended. I therefore offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After "$4,000" strike out the rest of the paragraph, namely, "one clerk, $1,800; one clerk, $1,400; one clerk, $1,200; one messenger, $600; for contingent expenses, including printing, books, stationery, car-fare, and miscellaneous items, $2,000; in all, $11,000," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "For necessary expenses of said office, $6,000; in all, $10,000."

Mr. HENKLE. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana why he proposes to reduce the aggregate amount by $1,000, making it $1,000 less than he has already reported in the bill?

Mr. COBB. The reason that the system provided for by the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD,] which the committee has just adopted, will lessen the expenses of this office, and therefore they will not, in my judgment, need the amount of money they have now. I placed the amount in gross for the reason that under the organic act this matter is controlled by the commissioners of the District. They have the right now to abolish any of these offices, if they have a mind to, and they have a right to change them from one department to another. Now, I give them a sum in gross in order to meet the demand which the system provided for in the amendment to which I have alluded requires, and I think it is ample for that purpose.

Mr. HENKLE. I received a letter this morning, which I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read, from the collector of the District, in regard to the necessities of his office.

The Clerk read as follows:

COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1881.

I most respectfully yet urgently call your attention to the necessity for providing an adequate number of clerks for the proper discharge of the duties of this office. Any number less than that which has been asked for in the estimates for this office will render it utterly impossible to a proper discharge of the great responsibilities imposed upon the department. With the present limited force I am constrained to require the services of the clerks long after the daily office hours and late into the night, including holidays and the Sabbath. This fact is well known to the public.

Senators and Members of the House of Representatives who have occasion to transact business with this office for themselves or their constituents have observed the necessity for more clerical force. Within the last two or three years commissioners have imposed increased duties on the office. Besides the collection of water rents, the collection of special improvement taxes and other equally responsible trusts have been transferred, and no provision made whatever to properly supply the necessary clerical force with the large increase of work.

The work of the office has increased threefold, and notwithstanding this fact the clerical force has been reduced fully 30 per cent. of what was required to perform the same work, and there must necessarily be a lapse in many of the duties required if the force is lessened, and as a consequence complaints must inevitably follow.

I ask only for what is manifestly requisite, and any gentleman who will put himself to a momentary examination of the working of the office will fully substantiate the assertion.

Formerly this office had simply the annual taxes to collect, with a collector whose salary was $5,000, three deputies, whose salary aggregated $10,000, with a corps of seven additional clerks. Subsequently the deputies and two clerks were cut off, since when, however, the duties of the register has been consolidated with this office, thereby making a reduction of $10,000 without any increase of force assigned to this office in the discharge of this important trust.

I most urgently and earnestly request that you will lay the matter before your honorable committee, and that the representations set forth herein may be fully taken into consideration and the great necessity of restoring to this department of the District government sufficient employés to render the public ample and full justice.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN F. COOK,
Collector of Taxes, District of Columbia.

Hon. E. J. HENKLE,
House of Representatives.

Mr. COBB. Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be observed by the committee that the letter which has just been read even goes beyond the recommendations of the commissioners. It demands more service in that department than was estimated for by the commissioners. Now, the system that has been adopted by the amendment the committee has just put on this bill lessens the burdens of this office in this way, that it takes away other duties now imposed by the commissioners on this officer and leaves him merely the collection of the taxes.

Mr. HENKLE. That is what he has to do now.

Mr. COBB. He says in his letter he has the water taxes to collect and the collection of special improvement taxes and everything of that kind. I think these employés that are getting good salaries had better keep their mouths a little to themselves. I say that very frankly, as I would say it to this gentleman himself. He is getting his $4,000 a year, and he ought to be a little quiet and allow the commissioners to speak to Congress instead of his doing so, as he is not the mouth-piece of the commissioners.

I say, therefore, the system which has been adopted by the committee will lessen the expenses of this office by requiring the commissioners to bring it down to its legitimate duties. And when the amendment I now offer is adopted the office will run smoothly and in harmony with the system adopted in the amendment just agreed to.

Mr. HENKLE. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I think just here it is proper for me, or for some one, to say something in vindication of this particular department of the District government and its management. I think you will all admit that the tax-collection department is an essential department of the city government, and no one has pretended to say that the gentleman who is at the head of that department is not a capable, efficient, and most truthful officer. Colored man though he is, he is one of the most capable and efficient officers that I have ever seen in any department of the Government. I am not here to eulogize him but simply to do him justice. Invested with this responsible duty, and having held this position with credit to himself for years, he feels naturally an interest that his office should be properly provided for. He is held responsible for the performance of its duties, for keeping up the business of that office, and discharging it properly. He has assured me, and I am sure he is a truthful man, that he and his clerks work over-hours, that they work at night, and that they work even on Sundays in order to keep up the business of the office. This should not be necessary in a city like this.

Just think of it! Here is a large city with a very large amount of tax to be collected, consisting of taxes of various kinds, and this bill provides for the office of the collector three clerks—only three clerks. Formerly the tax-collector's office had merely to collect the taxes for the municipal government of the city of Washington. Now its work includes not only the municipal government of Washington, but Georgetown, and the whole of the District of Columbia.

And not only that, but the duties of other offices which were formerly distinct offices or of the District government have been transferred to this department. The water taxes have been collected there; the special improvement taxes are collected there. The duties of this office are responsible, onerous, and numerous. It was provided in the estimates sent in by the Treasury Department that there should be one more permanent clerk than is provided for in the bill reported by the gentleman from Indiana, and also that there should be two temporary clerks. These are stricken out. And now it is sought to reduce the appropriation still further.

I make an appeal in all candor to the gentlemen of this committee. It is an easy matter to excite a hostile feeling toward particular offices or particular divisions of the Government; but I ask gentlemen to be calm and considerate. Here is an office, perhaps the most important and responsible of the municipal government. The Secretary of the Treasury has estimated that the appropriations necessary for the maintenance of this office should be $11,400. That is the recommendation from the Treasury. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] in reporting his bill made it $11,000, which is less than it really ought to be. I trust the committee will not hastily strike out the provision of this section, but insert in lieu such an appropriation as will facilitate the operations of this most important department of the municipal government.

I want to state further that recently there has been directed an index to be made in the collector's office of all the tax sales and transfers made in this District since 1812, a very laborious duty. There is no one assigned to this duty, and no one can be unless some provision is made to pay for it. The work is to prepare a numerical list of all the lots and sections in this city and of all the transfers made since 1812, a work necessary for the convenience of property-holders and all persons searching titles, and of great value to the District. [Here the hammer fell.] I withdraw my formal amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. COBB; and upon a division there were—ayes 51, noes 16.

No further count being called for, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENKLE. I move to amend the paragraph as now amended by adding thereto that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That any unexpended balance of the contingent fund appropriated for this office for the year ending June 30, 1881, not exceeding $1,500, may be expended for temporary clerk-hire.

Mr. COBB. I reserve all points of order upon that amendment.

Mr. HENKLE. I would like to have the gentleman state his point of order. I desire to say this much in support of the amendment: we have cut down the appropriation for this office to $10,000, when the bill as reported by the gentleman himself allowed $11,000. By so doing you will cripple and embarrass the business of this office to such an extent that it will, I am sure, be a very serious inconvenience to the people of the District.

The collector in charge of this office has been economical in the expenditure of this contingent fund, and he asks as a last resort (if Congress will not allow him a sufficient amount of money to employ the clerical force necessary to discharge the duties of his office) that he may be permitted to use the unexpended balance of the contingent fund to employ the necessary clerical force. This money is already appropriated, and has been frugally saved, and is now there standing to his credit.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] insist upon his point of order?

Mr. COBB. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the following:

For attorney's office: For one attorney, $4,000; one assistant attorney, $1,900; one clerk, $960; one messenger, $192; for rent of office, $300; for contingent expenses, including books, stationery, printing, and miscellaneous items, $500; in all, $7,852.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting after the words "one assistant attorney, $1,900," the words "one special attorney, $960." If that shall be adopted, and it be deemed necessary, I will follow it up by an amendment to abolish the office of messenger.

Now, in regard to the amendment I have offered, I desire to say that, from all the information I have been able to obtain, it is impossible to get along without this special assistant attorney. He is the attorney to attend before the police court of the District, where a great deal of the business of the attorney's office is transacted.

In order to place the matter properly before the Committee of the Whole, I desire to have read a letter from the attorney of the District addressed to the Committee on Appropriations of this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

ATTORNEY'S OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
January 28, 1881.

GENTLEMEN: I beg to call your attention to the pending District appropriation bill, beginning with line 230, making appropriations for this office. It will be seen that this contemplates but one assistant. The office has always, since the creation of the police court, been organized with two, the second called the special assistant, and, in my judgment, its labors cannot be performed without him.

I ask your attention to a brief statement of the services performed. The last annual report, covering nine months, ending with June, 1880, shows that thirty-six civil cases were disposed of in the higher courts. Forty-two were tried in the criminal court on appeal by defendants from the police court.

For the same time over three thousand cases were tried by the special assistant in the police court. There was then left pending two hundred and thirty-six civil cases in the courts of record, and one hundred and forty-five appeal cases in the criminal court. This does not cover cases tried before justices of the peace.

Written opinions in eighty-two cases, covering two hundred and thirty-three pages, were delivered, and nearly as many cases disposed of by opinions indorsed on the papers. No reference is made to consultations with the commissioners, letters written, &c.

During this period I was quite constantly before the House District Committee for over four weeks.

There has been no diminution of business since June.

The cases of the District are of the greatest importance, both in amount and the questions involved. Counsel for the other side are sometimes paid more in single cases than the whole cost of this office.

These cases are distributed in the two branches of the circuit court, the equity, criminal court, general term, and Supreme Court of the United States; all frequently in session at the same time. It is obvious that these, with the demand for opinions and other services, require the constant attention of myself and one assistant. We usually are obliged to try our cases, each without the other's aid, and against the ablest lawyers practicing here. Neither of us can do the duties required in the police court. That has jurisdiction of all cases where the District is the prosecutor, and they now number over five thousand per year. The special assistant appears in that court early each morning for every working day of the year, and is usually occupied in and about his duties connected with that court fully two-thirds of his time. When free from them, he finds ample employment in the general duties of this office. While that court exists the District must have a prosecutor specially assigned to it.

The duties of the law clerk are laborious, and consume all his time in copying opinions, preparing pleadings, bills of exceptions, various special duties, and the care of the books. He is a good lawyer and an accomplished short-hand writer, and reports the evidence in our more important cases, when other duties permit.

It is thus apparent that the service of this office absolutely requires a second assistant, and I trust that on this showing no hesitation will be felt in providing for his compensation.

In justice to all these meritorious officers, I cannot conclude without a word as to their present greatly inadequate compensation. The whole time of myself and assistants is required for this service. We can attend to no valuable private practice. The first, an able lawyer, is paid less than $2,000, and each of the others less than a first-class clerk under the General Government.

In quantity and importance the services of this office equal that of the United States attorney for this District. The whole expense of that office is near fifteen thousand dollars per annum, and the compensation of its officers is not in excess for the work performed.

Respectfully submitted.

A. G. RIDDLE,
Attorney District of Columbia.

Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS,
And the gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives.

The question was taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. HUNTON; and upon a division there were—ayes 34, noes 25.

No further count being called for, the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For streets:

For sweeping, cleaning, and sprinkling streets and avenues, $30,000; cleaning alleys, $6,500; for current work of repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys, $20,000; current repairs to county roads, $10,000; cleaning and repairing lateral sewers and basins, $20,000; in all, $86,500: Provided, That so much of the act of Congress approved April 6, 1870, as prohibits the commissioners of the District of Columbia from narrowing the carriage-ways of Louisiana and Indiana avenues and a portion of Four-and-a-half street be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to amend the portion of the paragraph relating to the "currrent work of repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys," by striking out "$20,000" and inserting "$25,000." I am assured by the engineer commissioner of the District, Major Twining, that $25,000 is the least he can get along with.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 12, noes 25.

No further count being called for, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to amend that portion of the paragraph relating to "current repairs of county roads" by striking out, "$10,000" and inserting "$20,000."

Mr. COBB. I reserve all points of order upon that amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say in support of the amendment I have offered that this item of the appropriation is for keeping in repair the roads in the country part of the District. I am informed by Commissioner Twining that there are about a hundred miles of roads in the country part of the District, and that $10,000 will not be sufficient to keep them in repair. As we are all aware, these roads must be kept in good repair as they lead to the avenues and parks about the city.

Mr. COBB. I desire to say that this is not the only appropriation made for repairs of roads. There is an appropriation of $5,000 in another portion of the bill, making with this appropriation $25,000 in all, which I think is enough for the country roads.

Mr. HUNTON. Whereabout is that?

Mr. COBB. In a former part of the bill.

Mr. NEAL. This branch of the business of the District of Columbia is in charge of Major Twining, an Army officer and a very competent man. He tells the Committee on Appropriations that the amount recommended in this bill is not sufficient, that he cannot keep in good repair the roads of the District with any such small sum of money as that.

Now I appeal to the members of this committee that this economy on our part, this failure to make appropriations which are necessary, will result in the roads falling into decay; and the consequence will be that at its next session Congress will have to appropriate perhaps double the money now asked for to put these roads in as good repair as they are in now. We cannot save money by cutting off a dollar this year and paying two dollars next year. I trust, therefore, this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. COBB. I desire to say with regard to the county roads—we may call them county roads, for they are outside the city limits but within the District—that I have traveled over the District a great deal and I have found no bad roads, but some of the best in the country.

Now, I am very sure that a hundred dollars a mile—and more than that amount is appropriated by this bill—is enough to repair these roads and keep them in good condition.

When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] says that Major Twining is an able and efficient officer, I am perfectly willing to concede that fact. I have so found him in every particular when he has been before me. I know that he differs with me about this subject, because as an engineer commissioner of the District, in charge of the streets and roads, he takes pride in making these highways not only convenient but he wants to make them pleasant and agreeable to the public. I do not object, except that in view of the expense I think we cannot afford to beautify these roads, which I believe is what Major Twining would desire to do. There is a mere difference of opinion between him and myself. I think that utility is what we should look to in this respect rather than beauty.

Mr. NEAL. I wish to ask the gentleman whether in his opinion Major Twining is not more competent to determine what should be appropriated for these roads than any man on this floor?

Mr. COBB. I would not pretend to say that he is not; but I know it is a habit with gentlemen who have control of these things to ask sometimes more than they expect to get; and although the Committee on Appropriations has cut down these appropriations a little below what Major Twining would be disposed to ask, I believe the public service will not be injured.

Mr. NEAL. Allow me to ask the gentleman one further question: In all the intercourse he has had with Major Twining has he seen any disposition on the part of that officer toward unnecessary expenditures or extravagance?

Mr. COBB. I must concede that I have not. He has perhaps urged some appropriations a little further than I thought proper; but that was a mere difference of opinion. It is due to him I should say that he is a high-minded and efficient officer. From him more than from any other man in this District I have obtained the information upon which I have acted in the preparation of this bill.

Mr. NEAL. In view of the statements which the gentleman from Indiana himself has made, I trust the Committee of the Whole will adopt Major Twining's judgment, instead of the gentleman's.

Mr. HUNTON. I want to say one word in behalf of this amendment. It is not only Major Twining who asks for this appropriation of $20,000 instead of $10,000. The Secretary of the Treasury has recommended the appropriation as provided in the amendment. The clause of the bill now under consideration appropriates $86,500:

For sweeping, cleaning, and sprinkling streets and avenues, $30,000; cleaning alleys, $6,500; for current work of repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys, $20,000; current repairs to county roads, $10,000; cleaning and repairing lateral sewers and basins, $20,000; in all, $86,500.

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates for this same work, $126,000. This is the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the engineer commissioner of the District, Major Twining; but the Committee on Appropriations propose to give for these purposes only $86,000, being a reduction of $40,000 upon the estimates of the District commissioners as well as the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, my amendments propose to restore these appropriations to the amount estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury—$126,000. But the first amendment I offered, increasing the appropriation for repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys, from $20,000 to $25,000, has been decided in the negative. I now propose that the appropriation for current repairs to county roads be increased from $10,000 to $20,000. The county part of this District gets but small appropriations at the hands of Congress, although it pays its legitimate share of the expenses of the Government. The commissioner of the District, as well as the Secretary of the Treasury, ask that $20,000 may be appropriated for repairs of county roads.

Mr. COBB. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] that the Secretary of the Treasury has not specially recommended an appropriation of the amount the gentleman proposes. It will be remembered that under the law it is the duty of the commissioners to send their estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury for revision. After he has revised them so far as he thinks proper, he sends them back to the commissioners.

Mr. HUNTON (addressing Mr. COBB) made an inaudible remark.

Mr. COBB. Yes; that is just what I said yesterday; but when I then presented suggestions coming directly from the Treasury Department the gentleman was not disposed to regard them. He talks about my blowing hot and cold. Now, yesterday it was himself who blew cold. When the Secretary of the Treasury had pointedly said that the commissioners were wrong, and when he made changes in their estimates, the gentleman from Virginia did not think there was much weight in the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. But now the gentleman's point is that the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended a certain appropriation simply because he has not made any change or revision in that portion of the estimates.

Now, I wish to make a statement which I think will not be denied. I talked freely with Major Twining about this matter. I like to talk with him about the business of this District; and although he said he did not think the amount the committee proposed to appropriate in this case was enough, he said that he would get along with it; that he could get along with it if Congress did not choose to give more. I do not regard him as urging the absolute necessity of this great appropriation for these county roads.

Mr. HUNTON. I beg leave to state to the gentleman from Indiana that the amendment I have offered is in the handwriting of Major Twining.

Mr. COBB. That may be.

Mr. HUNTON. He handed it to me and asked to have it adopted.

Mr. COBB. But it was only last week when I went over this matter with Major Twining; and I then understood him as not seriously objecting to anything in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON.]

The question being taken the amendment was not agreed to; there being—ayes 21, noes 36.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the parking commission: For one superintendent, $1,200; one assistant superintendent, $700; contingent expenses, including laborers, cart hire, trees, tree-boxes, tree-stakes, tree-straps, planting and care of trees, whitewashing, care of parks, and miscellaneous items, $13,000; in all, $14,900.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I move in line 317 to strike out "thirteen" and insert "eighteen," so it will read "$18,000;" and, further, to make the total amount conform thereto.

Mr. COBB. I think that is subject to a point of order.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I am assured by the parking commission, which serves the District without compensation, that this amount is absolutely necessary for the proper care of the seventy thousand trees under its control.

Mr. COBB. I will say this, Mr. Chairman, that I examined that question very carefully. Last year, I learn, this parking commission set out five thousand trees, enough to supply eight miles of streets. We give them in this bill $13,000, which is about the same amount we gave last year when they did all this work.

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. COBB. I think I am right that the appropriation was $13,000 last year.

Mr. HUNTON. Was it not $18,000 last year?

Mr. COBB. I insist, if no other gentleman desires to address the House on this question, upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COBB. It increases expenses.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. But it does not change existing law.

Mr. COBB. It may not be a change of existing law, but it is not in the line of economy. [Laughter.] There is no existing law on the subject, and therefore there is no law to change.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion the point of order is not well taken. The question therefore recurs on the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 47.

So the amendment was agreed to.

For street lamps: For illuminating material and lighting and extinguishing, $103,325; erection of street lamps, $500; one superintendent, $900; repairs to pumps, $3,000; cleaning tidal sewer, $3,000; in all, $110,825: Provided, That no more than $25 per annum for each street lamp shall be paid for gas, lighting, extinguishing, repairing, and cleaning, under any expenditure provided for in this act; and in case a contract cannot be made at that rate, the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to substitute other illuminating material, and to use so much of the sum hereby appropriated as may be necessary for that purpose.

Mr. WARD. In line 326 I move to insert "$28" instead of "$25," so it will read "provided that not more than $28 per annum shall be paid for gas, lighting, extinguishing, repairing, and cleaning," &c. I offer that amendment, Mr. Chairman, because I consider it is only a fair rate to pay for each street lamp for the gas consumed. As I understand the question, the commissioners of the District of Columbia estimated that rate per lamp. The cost of cleaning, repairing, and extinguishing the lamps amounts to $5.60 per annum for each lamp, which leaves about twenty-two dollars and forty cents for the gas consumed. The estimate is 13,200 feet per lamp, and that would leave about one dollar and sixty cents per thousand for the gas. That is nothing more than a fair and honest price, but in comparison it is far below the price paid in any other cities for coal gas.

I offer the amendment for the purpose of gaining information in this regard, and also because, as I have already stated, I believe it is only a fair price for the gas consumed. I do not think either the Appropriations Committee or the commissioners want anything but a fair rate of compensation.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say I had been under the impression the price charged for the District government was too high, but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] and myself went into a calculation some time ago which demonstrated to us the fact that the rate of $25 per lamp, including cleaning, lighting, and extinguishing, would put the price of gas in this city at about one dollar and sixty cents, or less than the company is required by law to furnish gas to individuals. The provision of the law is it shall charge $2 to inhabitants per thousand feet and $1.75 to the Federal Government. This, therefore, is putting it below the price limited by the general law on the subject.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman inform me how many lamps there are in this city?

Mr. HUNTON. I have just now forgotten the number.

Mr. BROWNE. Will any gentleman give me the information?

Mr. HUNTON. I think I can tell in a moment. The number is 4,223, and each lamp burns during the year 2,200 hours. I think the amendment of the gentleman ought to prevail.

Mr. WARD. The rate is $1.60 as proposed by my amendment.

Mr. COBB. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the committee and the gentleman from Virginia to the report of the Treasurer upon this question. He says this on page 6 of his letter to this House in suggesting a provision to meet this question, and after a careful consideration of it, and also after a personal interview with Major Twining, I put this provision in. Now, the Secretary says to insert this provision:

Provided, That no more than $25 per annum for each street lamp shall be paid for gas, lighting, extinguishing, repairing, and cleaning under any expenditure provided for in this act; and in case a contract cannot be made at that rate, the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to substitute other illuminating material, and to use so much of the sum hereby appropriated as may be necessary for that purpose.

That is the provision incorporated in the bill. A reason was given for incorporating that provision in the bill by reference to the act governing the lighting the Executive Mansion for the fiscal year 1880 and 1881, volume 20, page 388, &c. The item of $1,000 estimated by the commissioners for repair of street lamps will not be necessary if the provision is adopted, and it is therefore inserted in the bill with a view to meeting all these points.

Now, I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, taking his own basis——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman give way for a moment to receive a message from the Senate?

Mr. COBB. Certainly.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SPARKS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, was received, announcing that the Senate had passed a resolution to publish 1,000 copies of the report of the joint commission appointed to examine into the organization, system of discipline, and course of instruction, &c., of the Military Academy at West Point; also that the Senate had passed, with amendments, a resolution of the House to print 1,000 copies of the atlas of Colorado, by Professor Hayden; in which resolution and amendments concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. COBB. Now, with regard to the cost of gas. I understand that it is admitted by this provision that the gentleman desires to incorporate here that it will cost $1.65 per thousand.

Mr. WARD. One dollar and sixty cents.

Mr. COBB. Very well; $1.60. That is what we are to pay if your provision is adopted?

Mr. WARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. COBB. Now, does the gentleman know that gas can be manufactured here at a cost of less than $1 per thousand feet? Does he know that it is manufactured at a cost of sixty cents a thousand in Pittsburgh? Of course I admit that it can be manufactured at a less cost there than it can be here. I had occasion a few years ago to examine closely into this gas question. I had occasion to examine and see the sworn testimony of gentlemen from New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, and Saint Louis, taken by a special committee appointed by the city council of Cincinnati to look into this gas question, and I found what other gentlemen found who examined their report, that there is no substance in this country that costs so much to the people in proportion to the cost of manufacture as this commodity, illuminating gas; and I believe in this city there is no other business which affords such a source of revenue or profit from the amount of capital engaged in it as this gas business. I also remember very well in my own State we had a small gas company in the little city where I lived, and I took occasion to break down the monopoly there, and sent for all these reports, which gave me all the information I wanted.

I examined into the question carefully, and with the information that I have been able to derive from all of these sources, I do say to-day in the presence of this committee that gas can be manufactured here at a cost not exceeding $1 per thousand feet. I would be perfectly willing, in the event that it should become necessary, to say to the commissioners of this District, if they could not get it done for what we provide in this bill that I will bring $1,000,000 to bear upon the establishment of works for its manufacture in this District.

In reference to the price proposed to be paid by this bill, I will say that I did not do this without consulting with the commissioners. I had an interview with Major Twining and consulted him carefully as to the facts. From the information derived from him, I believe that we could make a contract with the gas company here to furnish in this city gas-lamps at an expenditure of not exceeding $23 per annum for each post. Major Twining said he believed it could be done, but he suggested the propriety of not limiting him to that amount, but would prefer that I would make it $25, and that was done in accordance with his views upon the subject. After a careful examination of the question, I think, without doubt, that a liberal estimate has been made for this purpose, taking into consideration the cost of the material furnished; and, as I have said before, I am convinced that there is more profit upon the product of the gas-works than there is in the manufacture of any other single commodity in this city.

Mr. HAZELTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COBB. Certainly.

Mr. HAZELTON. The gentleman has stated that it costs less to manufacture gas in Pittsburgh than it does in Washington. Now, why is it that gas is cheaper in Pittsburgh than it is here?

Mr. COBB. For one reason the Pittsburgh coal makes more gas than the coal used here.

Mr. HAZELTON. Is not the coal a little nearer Pittsburgh than it is here?

Mr. COBB. Undoubtedly that also enters into the cost.

Mr. HAZELTON. They get their coal cheaper in Pittsburgh, and their transportation is not so great.

Mr. COBB. Very well; does the gentleman know how much coal it takes to make 1,000 feet of gas? If he does not I can inform him. Two bushels is all that is required.

Mr. HAZELTON. It would depend upon the price of coal somewhat as regulating the profit derived from the manufacture, would it not?

Mr. COBB. But I have given here a margin of sixty cents, or in fact of seventy cents of profit. Putting the price of gas here at $1.60, there is a margin of profit of from sixty to seventy cents per thousand upon it.

Mr. HAZELTON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that gas is cheaper in Baltimore and in Ohio and in New York than it is here?

Mr. COBB. I did not say that, but I referred to the evidence of a number of gas men, sworn evidence, showing that the gas in the city of Cincinnati could be made at a certain price, and giving the estimates and the figures in various cities running from sixty cents per thousand to $1.25 per thousand feet. The gentleman from Cincinnati doubtless will well remember the able committee sent out by the city council of that city to examine into this question some nine years ago?

Mr. WARD. I move to strike out the last word.

I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury making the estimates, and to the provision in the sundry civil bill of last year to which that letter alludes, and upon which I understand the recommendation of the Appropriations Committee was based. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury recommends this proviso as to the $25 per lamp, and bases that recommendation upon the clause in the sundry civil bill of last year which provided for the lighting of the Executive Mansion and public grounds, and which contains the proviso that not more than $25 shall be paid per lamp for gas. I should like to have the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] at this point. The provision in the sundry civil bill has been quoted, I think in error, by the Secretary of the Treasury in his letter of estimates as if it included not only the gas used in the lamp but also the lighting, extinguishing, and repairs of the lamp, which according to the estimates made for those purposes would be $5.60 more; so that in order to have the estimate consistent with the reference to the clause in the sundry civil bill the total appropriation would be $30.60, $2.60 more than is proposed by my amendment.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me, I will answer his statement with regard to the Treasury Department overlooking the provision in the sundry civil bill. I will state that I conferred with the Treasury Department carefully on this subject and they advise this provision as we have it; they did so not only in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, but personally, believing it would be a saving to the people and not an injury to the gas company.

Mr. WARD. The letter of the Secretary shows clearly on its face that there has been an error, because it alludes to a provision in the sundry civil bill which provided only for the gas at $25 per lamp, while this is for the lighting, extinguishing, and repair in addition to the cost of the gas.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks that the Secretary in his allusion to the section in the sundry civil bill has fallen into a mistake. Let me say to the gentleman that that section was specially called to the attention of the Department and they said it was evaded, and this section was asked to be put in the present bill so framed as to prevent the evasion which had occurred in the case of the section in the sundry civil bill. I say to the gentleman that the Treasury Department is perfectly in harmony with the amendment in this bill. It is their amendment and not mine; and I am simply here to advocate it because I think it is right and proper.

Mr. HUNTON. We have had this question of the cost of gas before the Committee on the District of Columbia, and it has been considered with great care there. It came before that committee on a bill to organize another and new gas company in the city of Washington. It was claimed that by the new process gas could be manufactured at a much less cost than the gas company of Washington now expends in the manufacture of gas. The matter was fought very hard before the committee, and some of the committee were for incorporating this new gas company with a view of furnishing cheap gas, under this process, to the people. But that bill did not pass the committee, and has not passed either House of Congress. And the question now is, what can the present gas company afford to make the gas for that is manufactured by the old process, by the company now in existence in Washington? And according to the best information I have, they cannot manufacture it so that it shall cost but $25 per lamp, including the lighting and the extinguishing of the lamps.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] has stated that Major Twining said he believed this could be done for $23 per lamp, but preferred to have $25 put in. I believe it is within the memory of many members of the committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman that the report reached us that the commissioners were about signing a contract for a period of three years for illuminating the streets at $28 per lamp, and the committee requested the commissioners by telephone to suspend signing that contract until this appropriation bill was passed, that it might not be embarrassed by a contract already made by the District commissioners. In compliance with that request, the commissioners appeared before the committee, if I am not mistaken, with the written contract which I understand would have been signed but for the telephone from the committee. Am I right?

Mr. NEAL. Yes; that is right.

Mr. COBB. Was Major Twining there?

Mr. HUNTON. I believe Mr. Twining was the very man who brought the contract to the committee-room. Will the gentleman from Ohio state whether that was not the case?

Mr. NEAL. I am not sure.

Mr. HUNTON. I am not myself sure which of the commissioners brought the contract to the committee-room; I believe it was Major Twining, but I am not sure. The contract, however, was brought there ready for signature, and the provision in the contract was $28 a lamp for the period of three years; and at our request the commissioners did not enter into that contract, but awaited the action of the two Houses on this appropriation bill.

Mr. NEAL. Last year the proposition was made to the District Committee to charter another gas company, and I, together with three other of the members, favored that proposition. The majority of the committee were very decided in the opinion that another gas company would be of no practical benefit to the people of this District. I thought at that time that the price charged for gas to the city was too much, and I thought so until a few days ago, when I made an investigation upon that point. I am not prepared now to say whether it is too much or not. But I wish to state, in order that the committee may vote intelligently, just what has been paid for gas and what will be paid if this bill becomes a law.

The burners used are six-foot burners; and I take it for granted we have an honest burning of the gas, because we have a gas inspector whose duty it is to see that the Government is not swindled in this matter of burning.

The street-lamp burners here in this city are six-foot burners. In New York they are only three-foot burners and in other cities they are either three or four feet. I doubt whether any city in the United States has as large burners for its street lamps as the city of Washington.

Mr. COBB. Let me ask the gentleman whether from his experience in the use of gas by private consumers in this city he is willing to say that the gas supplied here is good? If any man here is a good judge of gas, I would like to ask him whether the gas supplied in this city is good gas or not? I say it is not. I say that many times it is very hard for persons for three or four seconds even to read properly by it. It is so at my house, and I am now living at the corner of Fourteenth street and New York avenue. Before that I was down here on Third street, and during the time I was there I can certify that I had oftentimes to use a coal-oil lamp, and could not get along with the gas at all.

Mr. NEAL. I will say to the gentleman that last year at the house where I boarded I found that the gas was very poor. This year I occupy other rooms, and I think the gas is very good. It is different in different localities.

Mr. COBB. It should not be.

Mr. NEAL. The illuminating power of this gas is fixed by law, and the inspector certifies monthly to the proper officers of this Government that the gas is fully equal to what the law requires. Now, under the law we burn gas in this city for street lighting 2,200 hours every year. Six feet per hour would make 13,200 feet for every street-lamp. At $25 a light that would make the gas cost $1.47 per thousand feet.

Mr. COBB. Will my friend——

Mr. NEAL. I cannot be interrupted now; I have only five minutes. At $25 a light that would be $1.47 per thousand feet; at $26 a lamp-post it would be $1.54 per thousand; at $27 a post it would be $1.62 per thousand; and at $28 a post it would be $1.69 per thousand.

Now, the city of Baltimore pays for its street lamps $1.85 per thousand for its gas, and in addition to that it pays the cost of lighting, which in this city is $5.60 a lamp. The city of Boston pays $1.75 per thousand, but that includes the expense of lighting. In the city of Philadelphia, where the works are owned by the city, the cost of the gas is $2 per thousand. In the city of Richmond, where the works are owned by the city, the cost is $2 per thousand. I have a statement in reference to some twenty cities, and in no one of them is the cost of the gas below $1.75 a thousand.

Now, as I said at the outset, I am not prepared to say that the amount recommended here is not sufficient. I made war on this gas company last year, not because I was not willing to do it justice, but because it seemed to me at that time that the interest of the people of the District required the chartering of another company, called the Municipal Gas Company, which proposed to furnish gas of a different kind and character and of different illuminating qualities. The Committee for the District of Columbia overruled me and therefore I gave way. I am willing to see justice done to this company notwithstanding the effort I made to have another company chartered.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. WARD. I withdraw the amendment I offered.

Mr. PAGE. I renew the amendment, as I wish to occupy the attention of this Committee of the Whole for a moment. I am surprised that the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL,] or any gentleman who has lived in this city for a number of years, should be willing to be an advocate of this gas monopoly in the city of Washington. I have lived in a great many different cities, and I have never known as great extortion perpetrated upon the people of any city as this gas company perpetrates upon the people of the city of Washington.

I think that $25 a light for street lamps is sufficient, and I hope this Committee of the Whole will not increase the amount one dollar. I think it is time Congress took this matter in hand and incorporated another gas company, and not continue this monstrous monopoly and this gross charge upon the people of this city any longer. I hope that not another dollar than the amount here reported by the Committee on Appropriations will be given to this gas company.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to make a statement in reply to what has just fallen from the lips of the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE;] just one statement.

During the last eighteen years I have never known any session of Congress in which there has not been a raid upon the gas company of this District. My opinion always has been that it was not for the good of the citizens of Washington or for the financial advantage of the Government of the United States that pays a great deal to this gas company. It has been merely to enable men to get possession of charters, to hold them over the heads of this company for no good purpose whatever. Companies have been constantly formed here, and have tried to be incorporated by Congress, and in my opinion it has been for pecuniary gain only, with no intention or idea of going into operation.

I believe that the members of the Committee for the District of Columbia, who have had so much experience in listening to complaints against this gas company and in hearing those who desired to have charters granted for their own benefit alone, or for the purpose of trying to punish this gas company—I think they will bear me out in saying that they have failed to convince them of the propriety of granting new charters. To-day the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] states that that committee has not been ready and is not now ready to report a bill to charter a new gas company.

Now about the gas furnished us in our rooms in the city of Washington. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] may perhaps not understand the fact that there is a difference in the meters used by families in this city. I have sometimes had the idea that those from whom we rent our rooms are to blame for the poor flow of the gas which we have.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman let me ask him one question?

Mr. O'NEILL. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. You have been here a long time. Have you ever bought any gas here, paid for it yourself?

Mr. O'NEILL. I never did.

Mr. PAGE. Well, I have kept house here, and I am one of the victims of the extortion of this gas company.

Mr. O'NEILL. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not know about that. I do know very well that there have been times when the gas was very poor in the rooms where we are obliged to sit and attend to our business or meet our friends; but my idea has been, in spite of what the gentleman says, that there is some defect in the pipes, that the difficulty is not owing to the gas company but to defects in the meter or the pipes for which the company is not responsible.

Now I would like the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] to explain if he can how it is possible even in the city of Pittsburgh, where the coal is dug from the hills all around the city, to manufacture gas for sixty cents a thousand feet. I would like him to explain the process. I think the information might be useful to other localities. It seems to me that the gentleman must be under a wrong impression.

Mr. HEILMAN. Mr. Chairman, although I own a controlling interest in a gas company myself, I am not here to defend this gas company of the District of Columbia; but when I hear gentlemen charge that it does not make good gas, I cannot allow the statement to pass. We have an inspector appointed under a law of Congress, and under our control, who certainly ought to do his duty; and his report shows that this gas company furnishes as good gas as is sold anywhere in America. How is it possible for this company to make two kinds of gas? Those who keep their burners and other fixtures in order have good gas. If others do not have the same quality of gas it is because their pipes or burners are defective, or for some other reason of that kind. Certainly no swindling can go on if the gas consumer attends properly to the meter, and the company is responsible for the inspection.

This business of manufacturing gas is not so profitable as many gentlemen suppose. I know that at times opposition companies come in and propose to manufacture cheap gas or to give us the electric light, but I hold that for illuminating purposes gas is about as cheap a light as you can get.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAZELTON. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the pending amendment, moved by the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. PAGE. I withdraw it.

Mr. HAZELTON. I renew it.

Mr. HEILMAN. Before the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] proceeds, I hope he will allow me a single word. I do not wish to be understood as having said that I own any stock in the gas company in this District. I do not own one dollar.

Mr. COBB. How much does my colleague own in the Evansville company?

Mr. HEILMAN. I own a controlling interest in that company.

Mr. COBB. I thought you did.

Mr. HAZELTON. That is the best interest, of course, to own. Now, Mr. Chairman, one would suppose from the range this discussion has taken that a great many members on this floor are peculiarly qualified to judge of the character of gas; and if the gas manufactured on this floor was as good as that in the burners overhead, this Government would not need to employ any gas companies, but might run a self-sustaining machine here at the center. [Laughter.]

My friend from California [Mr. PAGE] cries out against monopolies. We are not trying here to-day a question of monopolies. We are not legislating upon the comparative merits of two rival companies, nor are we discussing any bill for the charter of a new company. There is no bill before this committee asking the charter of a new company. The only question is whether $25 a year for each street lamp in this city is enough, or whether we should allow $28 as a matter of fair, square, honest dealing between us and the one gas company that we have here in this city. If there were two or three companies, the question would come up which we should employ or from which we should get our gas; but we have only one company; and the question for us to deal with honestly and without prejudice is not whether we may conceive that this gas company has charged us a little too much when we sat up a little later some nights than we thought we did, but whether in any city of the Union gas is furnished more cheaply. Is it the fact that in San Francisco, in Sacramento, in New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore—in any city except where coal is found almost at their door—gas is furnished more cheaply than in this city? No; those cities are paying more than we propose to pay when we pay $28 for each street lamp. Then, where is the great monopoly?

Mr. NEAL. My distinguished friend, the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE,] expresses his astonishment that I should appear on this floor as the advocate of a monopoly. Now, with all respect to the gentleman, I wish to say that I do not advocate any monopoly, nor am I the attorney on this floor for any company or any individual. All I desire is to arrive at the facts of the case, for it is upon facts that we must decide this matter. I care nothing for this gas company. If the committee think that $1.47 a thousand is enough for gas, I have not a word to say. I do not know what the price ought to be, for I know nothing about gas-works.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana has quoted the engineer commissioner on this question. Yesterday we telephoned to the engineer commissioner to come to our committee-room, and I interrogated him upon this subject. He said that in his opinion $28 for each street lamp was little enough; that $1.47 a thousand was not a sufficient price. He went on to say they charged a certain sum, I believe $25 a lamp in the city of New York, and he supposed that would be sufficient, but he has learned since his conversation with the gentleman from Indiana that that company had passed two dividends, or, in other words, was selling gas for less than it cost them to make it.

I care nothing about this thing. As I said in the beginning, I believed another gas company should be chartered, but on that point I was defeated. I stood with my colors flying and never gave up until the committee voted me down. While, perhaps, I should advocate that bill again, nevertheless I am not here to do injustice to this company or ask them to furnish gas at less compensation than that for which they can afford to manufacture it. I believe every man engaged in any enterprise of any kind or character which is beneficial should receive a fair compensation upon his investment in order to encourage him to continue it. As I would do with myself so would I do with this company.

Mr. COBB. I wish to say only a word in response to the suggestion of the gentleman about the hours during which gas is consumed in these lamps throughout the year. Now the law does not fix the number of hours, but that is fixed by the commissioners. I say they burn gas too many hours, or pretend to, in this District.

Mr. NEAL. The engineer commissioner told me yesterday that it was fixed by law, six feet an hour and twenty-two hundred hours.

Mr. COBB. Fixed by law because the commissioners pass ordinances or rules to that effect. They need not do that.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I move, after line 333, to insert the following:

Provided further, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall not be authorized to make any contract for gas or other illuminating material in accordance with the provisions of this act for any longer period than one year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON. I offer the following amendment:

In line 327, insert the following: "In the city of Washington, and $27.50 in the city of Georgetown;" so it will read: "Provided, That no more than $25 in the city of Washington, and $27.50 in the city of Georgetown shall be paid for gas," &c.

I have offered that amendment after consultation with the gentleman from Indiana in charge of the bill. It discriminates between the price paid in the city of Washington and that paid in the city of Georgetown. We thought it was right that a larger price should be paid in the city of Georgetown, which has but a small consumption of gas, while in Washington there is a large consumption of gas.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one major and superintendent, $2,610; one captain, $1,800; one property clerk, $1,800; one clerk, $1,500; three surgeons, at $450 each; six detectives, at $1,320 each; ten lieutenants, at $1,200 each; twenty sergeants, at $1,140 each; seven acting sergeants, at $1,080 each; seventy-three privates, class one, at $900 each; one hundred and twenty privates, class two, at $1,080 each; sixteen station-keepers, at $516 each; eight laborers, at $420 each; two telegraph operators and one telephone operator, at $780 each; one messenger, $900; one messenger, $360; one major and superintendent, mounted, $360; one captain, mounted, $240; fifty lieutenants, sergeants, and privates, mounted, at $240 each; two drivers, at $300 each; one ambulance driver, $600; rent of police-station houses and police headquarters, $5,960; for fuel, $1,500; repairs to station-houses, $1,500; miscellaneous and contingent expenses, including stationery, books, telegraphing, printing, gas, ice, washing, meals for prisoners, repairs to van, and detection of crime, $6,469; in all, $290,085.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 351, strike out "9" and insert "7;" and in line 352, strike out "3" and insert "5," and in the same line strike out "and $60;" and then, in line 365, strike out "$0" and insert "20."

Mr. COBB. This provides for a messenger at $700 instead of $900 and one at $500 instead of $360. This was done at the suggestion of the commissioners.

The amendments were agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose, and a message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, his Secretary.

The message announced that he had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 5047) relating to the appointment of professors of mathematics in the Navy;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 358) appropriating $2,500 to meet the expenses of the international sanitary conference invited to meet in Washington on the 1st January, 1881;

An act (H. R. No. 2658) to regulate the award of and compensation for public advertising in the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. No. 2968) for the relief of James D. Grant;

An act (H. R. No. 1894) authorizing the employment of an inspector of plumbing in and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 6614) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 340) in reference to the distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 369) making an appropriation for filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the grounds south of the Capitol along the line of the old canal, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 7029) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for interest on the 3.65 loan of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 6025) to establish an assay office in the city of Saint Louis, Missouri;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 266) ratifying settlement of taxes made by the District commissioners with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) to print 6,000 copies of the report of the National Board of Health.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For buildings for schools: For the purchase, when necessary, and the erection and completion of three buildings for primary and intermediate schools, two to be erected in the second school division and one in the sixth school division, (county,) $100,000, provided that they shall be contracted for before the 1st day of September next, and finished before the 1st day of August, 1882, to be appropriated as follows, namely: for the second school division, $96,000; for the sixth school division, (county,) $4,000.

Mr. HUNTON. I have an amendment to propose which goes not only to the paragraph just read but to the succeeding one, which I ask to be read at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the payment of the Washington school-fund bonds now held by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, $70,630.47; and said commissioners are hereby authorized and directed to cancel and destroy said bonds, and to use said appropriation in the erection and completion of a high-school building. Said building shall be located on that part of square numbered 446 commencing at the rear end of that part of said square heretofore dedicated to school purposes, two hundred feet in width, thence south same width to O street, in Washington City; and said building shall be contracted for and completed within the time fixed for the buildings provided for in the next preceding paragraph: And provided, That the plans and specifications for each of said school buildings shall be furnished by the Architect of the Capitol and approved by the board of school trustees, and the work shall be superintended by the District inspector of buildings.

Mr. SAMFORD. Before the gentleman from Virginia moves his amendment I desire to make the point of order that the second paragraph which has just been read is not in order. My point is that the paragraph changes existing law and is not in the line of retrenchment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Alabama state wherein the present law is changed?

Mr. SAMFORD. There is no law authorizing the building of a high-school house in the city of Washington. The building of school-houses here is carried on under authority of Congress under the general school system, putting it in the power of the commissioners to build common-school houses where necessary, but not high schools. There is no provision in the law for that, and this bill therefore contemplates legislation upon a subject for which there is no law existing. If there is I have not been able to find out after close examination.

In addition, it is taking possession of real estate which belongs to the District government provided for another purpose, and diverting it to another purpose not contemplated in the law authorizing its purchase, and therefore changes the law in that regard. There is no law now authorizing the building of the high school in the first place, and especially upon the lots where it is attempted to place it by this section of the bill. It certainly, as you can readily see at once, does not retrench expenditures. It is not in the line of economy, and there being no law for it, it necessarily changes existing law. It provides new legislation, and really is an additional expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear from the gentleman in charge of the bill upon this point of order.

Mr. COBB. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. NEAL. The gentleman from Alabama is clearly mistaken. There is a law authorizing the establishment of a high-school system in the District of Columbia, for a high school is just as much a part of the common-school system as the primary schools are. In addition to that, if the gentleman from Alabama will examine the law he will find that the grades of schools provided for are not only a common-school and high-school system, but a higher grade provision being made for a normal school also in the District. It does not, then, in that respect change existing law as claimed.

Now, in regard to the property, what are the facts? That property was bought years ago, the city purchasing it at a cost of $100,000 from Mr. Corcoran. It was worth at that time probably $25,000 to the city, but the city wanted to make a donation to the Corcoran Art Gallery and bought this property, which now belongs to the city as much as any piece of property can belong to any municipality on the face of the earth, and they have a right to make such disposition of it as they see fit.

Now, we propose to authorize—what? Simply to apply it to school purposes.

We have legislative power if we desire to make provision for these school buildings, and having possession of this property we propose to use it for such purpose as seems to be most appropriate. We propose, Mr. Chairman, to devote it to the high purposes of education. I believe that there is no man in this House who will not agree with me that that is one of the most important subjects upon which we can legislate. For myself, I am a great believer in the education of the youth of this country.

I will say further, Mr. Chairman, that there is already upon that property a primary-school building, and therefore it is very appropriate that the remainder of the square should be devoted to purposes of education of the youth of this city. It seems to me that the point of order raised by the gentleman from Alabama cannot be well taken.

Mr. SAMFORD. I might content myself, Mr. Chairman, in response to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio by simply asking him to turn to the law which authorizes the construction of this building attempted to be provided for in this bill. My information is that the legislative act passed some time in 1872, authorizing the purchase of this property, contemplated its use for market purposes. That being so, I contend that to apply it to school purposes would be a change of existing law to that extent, for it is an attempt to divert it from the original purpose for which its purchase was authorized by law.

I have never heard before that there was any more promised or paid for this square than its real value. The sum of $100,000 authorized by the legislative act to be paid in bonds for this square was as

I understand considered to be the value of the property, Mr. Corcoran agreeing to give the interest on the bonds to the Corcoran Art Gallery for a certain number of years, and at the end of a certain period perhaps the principal was to be devoted in that way. I have never heard before, sir, that it was a donation on the part of the District.

Mr. NEAL. The gentleman from Alabama is not perhaps familiar with the facts of the case.

Mr. SAMFORD. I have just stated that it was the first time I have ever heard of it. But that there is any evidence that the property was not worth the amount paid for it, or authorized to be paid for it by the legislative act, I have never heard before; never heard it questioned until this moment.

Now, my point of order is that the legislative act under which that property was purchased provided it should be purchased for a market. That is the law of the District now in force, which never has been repealed and which never has been carried out. But it is attempted now in this bill to divert it from the purpose for which it was originally intended, and the sum of $70,000 is provided in this bill for the erection of a high-school building upon it.

I take this occasion to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am not opposed to the erection of school buildings or to the education of youth. I am as much in favor of it as the gentleman from Ohio can possibly be. I believe that these buildings should be erected with a reasonable regard to the requirements of the people and the ability of the District to pay for them. But there are purposes which are just as important to some parts of the city. It is necessary to have a market at this point, and if I am overruled on the point of order I shall offer an amendment to that effect, that the law shall be confined to that which it originally contemplated, the erection of a market place on this square. This piece of property was authorized to be purchased at the same time that two other pieces were authorized to be purchased for market purposes. One of these was in the northern part of the city, the piece now under consideration, one was in the western and one in the eastern part of the city. In accordance with the provisions of the act market-houses were erected in the eastern and western portions of the city, but in consequence of the failure to negotiate the bonds, although the building was commenced on this square, it was never completed.

It is therefore in consideration of the desire of the people of that part of the city for market facilities, together with the fact that you may find other localities for the erection of the high school, that I make in the first place the point of order.

Mr. KLOTZ. There are two or three things connected with the subject of the market on square 446 which, if the House would understand, they certainly would not devote that ground for school purposes. It was a violation of the rights acquired under the law, and all the circumstances connected with the purchase of that property, to put on it the school-house lately commenced. Eight or nine years ago, when that property was sold by Mr. Corcoran, it was sold for $100,000, in bonds payable in twenty years, at 7 per cent. Mr. Corcoran himself said he sold it to the commissioners with the understanding it should be the site for a market, the object being to promote the furnishing of a market for that portion of the city. To encourage the Corcoran Art Gallery, he afterward agreed to present those bonds, or the interest on those bonds for twenty years, to the Corcoran Art Gallery. About eight years of that time have expired. The District is in debt, head over heels. The amount of money that is appropriated by Congress for District purposes is enormous. There are 20,000 paupers on your hands to be fed; yet it seems there is a desire to spend and squander the money of the District. It would seem as if Congress, in legislating for the District had but two objects—to protect the gas company, and then to protect all those other people in the city who are seeking to carry out private arrangements of their own for the purpose of filling their pockets; and this is one of those schemes.

The very fact that Mr. Corcoran agreed to appropriate the interest for twenty years on those bonds to the Corcoran Art Gallery, directing that it should afterward be presented to the District of Columbia for the purpose of building markets, should be sufficient, at least for honest men, to make them carry out the contract.

The market has been on that ground for a number of years. It consists of nothing but old sheds, as you may call them. At the same time, proving that that is a good place for a market, the revenues from the old sheds that stand there amount at present to four or five thousand dollars a year. This square was set apart for market purposes. The people understood it was for a market, and that attracted various individuals to buy property at an advanced price around the square. The valuation of property around that market was doubled by the assessors because it was around the market square. The people who owned the property paid for years double the amount of taxes because it was a market square. Buildings have been erected and their value has been enhanced just for that reason, which will add in taxes to the revenues of the Government.

They now agree, if they can build a market, to take half of the square for that purpose. They offer, without any cost to the District government, to take half of the square and pay half of the interest on the $100,000—namely, $3,500—for the next twelve years. They agree to pay $3,500 a year interest, helping the District government in its finances to that extent. And they propose to expend $40,000 on a building, and to pay taxes on the building after it is erected. And, as I have said, the income from the market at present is about five thousand dollars.

Now you propose to spend $100,000 on two school-houses. One of the school-houses has been built in the center of one side of the square, and this provides that the other shall be built exactly in the center of the other side of the square. This very fact shows there is something behind that has not been developed here. It is that those who own or fell heirs to the K street market, the stock of which they bought at half price, are the powers behind the throne.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How far is K street market from this square?

A MEMBER. Several squares.

Mr. KLOTZ. The street-cars do not go within a square and a half of this.

Mr. NEAL. They go right by.

Mr. KLOTZ. What I say is, they do not go within a square and a half of the K street market, and the people will not patronize it. This market pays twice as much to the Government as the K street market in all its glory.

The desire of many men in this House to urge this matter shows that something lies behind it. I say it is robbery from first to last. It is in violation of an agreement and a contract. It is an abuse of the confidence of those who have bought property and paid taxes there for eight years on property the assessed value of which has been doubled by the expectation of having a market house. And now if you make it a site for a school-house you detract from the value of the property.

Mr. COBB. It seems we have got into a discussion of the merits while the point of order was pending; and if there be no objection I should like to say something on the merits.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from Indiana on the point of order.

Mr. COBB. I have not the statutes before me; but the law provides for a board of trustees under the supervision to some extent of the commissioners. And it goes on and provides the system of education as has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio. This system has been carried on for years without objection, and we have appropriated for it every year. Why, sir, the section just preceding this provides for the expenditure of $100,000 for the building of three intermediate school-houses. And the reason why it is proposed to appropriate for building a high school is because the high school is not taught now in a separate building but has to be accommodated in the upper stories of the Franklin building and the Seaton building. The result is that young ladies, or girls of thirteen or fourteen, have now to climb those immense stairways; and every gentleman here who has practical experience knows the danger of requiring females of that age to go up and down stairways.

This system is now in actual existence. Schools are to-day being taught, the very schools that would be transferred to this building, in the upper stories of the Franklin and the Seaton buildings, and teachers are employed under the system directed by law. I think, therefore, there can be no question upon the legal proposition in regard to this point of order.

Mr. BRIGHT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question just there?

Mr. COBB. Certainly.

Mr. BRIGHT. I wish to know of the gentleman whether the deed of the property created any trust for any particular purpose?

Mr. COBB. I will answer the gentleman. I want first to call attention to some facts that will tend to sustain this point of order, though my statements may look rather to the merits of the proposition than to the point of order.

An appeal is made here for a market house on this property. Do gentlemen know that there are now two market houses, one of them one of the finest in the city, within three squares of where it is proposed to put this one? I have a map which has been prepared with great care and which shows the location of the market houses. One of them is the Northern Liberty Market, the finest in the city, and which is wanted by a railroad company as a depot. They are therefore against this school building on that account. They want to break down this Northern Liberty Market which has been built under the direction of the commissioners of this District.

The commissioners of the District in three several reports have recommended that this Corcoran Square be devoted to school purposes. They have already erected a school building on the northeast quarter of the square at a cost of $45,000. The market-men want to drive the school away from a site which is valuable to the people, and which can be reached by street railroads as can no other point in the city. There is no other place in the city so well adapted to a school house as is this square.

It is said that the deed of the property was made in a peculiar way. I have examined that deed and have had others examine it. I have here the brief of counsel heard upon the subject. There never has been any question but what square 446 belonged to the District to do as it pleased with it, and Mr. Corcoran will not pretend to-day that that is not true.

It is true that at the time this property was purchased from Mr. Corcoran it was thought that it would be necessary to use it for a market house. But that necessity has passed away. A school has been located upon the northeast quarter of it. There are two market houses already within three squares of it. It is now proposed to erect the third market house, and there will then be three market houses, no two of them six squares from each other.

There is one thing I wish to call to the attention of this committee. As I have said, a school building has already been erected under the direction of the present board of commissioners upon a part of this square, at a cost of $45,000. It is not now quite completed. I have here the recommendations of the commissioners upon the subject. In 1875, which I am sure was before the Northern Liberty market building was erected—I think I am correctly informed on that point—before the men had invested their money in the Northern Liberty market, under what they believed to be the intention of the commissioners, to devote this square to school purposes, the commissioners made this statement:

The commissioners venture to call the attention of Congress to the fact of the District now owning a valuable property in the city of Washington, known as Corcoran square, originally purchased for market purposes, but which they are of opinion could be more advantageously used for the public interests in aid of the public schools.

Again, in the year 1878 the board of school trustees urged the appropriation of this square for the benefit of the public schools, and their recommendations again received the approval of the commissioners of the District, as shown in their report. And again in the last report of the commissioners of the District is the following:

We approve that the lots in square 446, purchased by the District for a market, be utilized. These lots, since the erection by private enterprise on square 515, are not required for the purpose intended, and the commissioners are of the opinion that the lots named could be most economically and beneficially used, i. e., for school purposes.

Now, in pursuance of these recommendations, as I have before said, the school board went on and erected a school building on the northeast corner of this square, at a cost of $45,000. Now, I want to ask gentlemen what they think of the proposition of locating a school-house and a market building on the same square? Do you want saloons and restaurants to be set up near the school-house, to tempt and invite the school children to turn away from their studies and indulge in the poisonous draught which will lead them to ruin?

Mr. KLOTZ. They are there now.

Mr. COBB. Do not put such temptations in their pathway unless it is necessary to do it. This proposition comes from a class of men—do gentlemen know who leads it? Mr. Wilson leads it. Who is he? He is a man who lives upon sixth street, away from this market. He spoke at a meeting last night in favor of it, at a meeting held by gentlemen who want to engage in the new enterprise which will ruin one of the best school-houses in the city. He objected to the police court where it now is, because it was near his house. Now he wants to put near a school-house, where fifteen hundred children of this District have to go, a market building which will draw flies there to the great annoyance of the scholars and teachers, and lead to the introduction of saloon keepers and restaurant keepers to mislead and destroy your children.

I put it to you, gentlemen, whether or not this is just? With these two market-houses located as you see upon the map, do the citizens need a market-house at this point? The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company want it, because they want the Northern Liberty Market for a depot. They are marching in that direction, as I have found out in the careful examination I have given this question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is this a discussion of the point of order or the merits of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order.

Mr. COBB. I am aware that I am digressing somewhat into the merits of the question; and if objection is made, I certainly will not go on. These considerations have certainly some connection, though a very remote one, with the question of order.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that some men in this city are opposed to locating this public school on this square. The square is divided into four quarters. The northeast quarter is now occupied by the building I have spoken of. The northwest quarter fronts on Seventh street, one of the greatest thoroughfares and business streets in the city. That street is not a proper location for a school-house. The ground on Seventh street is more valuable for other purposes than school purposes, if the District should ever desire so to use it. This bill provides that a school-house shall be erected on the southeast quarter of the square. The market-men want to take the south half of this beautiful square and build a market-house running right along with the school building that is now erected. They want to put this market-house where, according to the board of commissioners, it is not wanted. I do not mean the present board, though I believe two of them take the same position, having been members of the board at the time when the report to which I have already alluded was made.

Now, will this committee undertake to place on this valuable square, so suitable for school purposes, a building that must necessarily interfere with the use of the square for school purposes, so that sooner or later the city must be driven either to remove the market-house that may be erected there or to remove the school-house it already has there? for the two structures are inconsistent and cannot stand together upon the same square.

Mr. KLOTZ. Which was built first?

Mr. COBB. The school-house.

Mr. KLOTZ. It is not half done yet.

Mr. COBB. There is not on this square at present any market-house such as the gentleman would seem to indicate. There are a few old shanties, which have been recently repaired at an expense of more than $1,000 to the District. This brings me to another point. The gentleman says that these market people pay the District five or six thousand dollars. I wish to say that the money received for rents is paid out in the erection or repair of old shanties that do not amount to anything.

Mr. SAMFORD. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt at this stage to follow my distinguished friend from Indiana away from the point of order into the merits of this case, though I am aware that in discussing the merits of the question he did so by permission. But I ask leave to refer to one or two statements of fact which I have never heard before. In the first place, I have never heard that any railroad company desires this lot for a depot.

Mr. NEAL. That does not relate to the point of order.

Mr. SAMFORD. I have just said so. Now, as to the statement that the commissioners recommend the erection of this school building on this square, I have a letter which I shall ask to have read at a proper stage of the discussion on the merits.

It is conceded that this proposition does not retrench expenditures. Now, the question is, does it change existing law? I have defied the gentleman to show any authority according to law for the building of this high school. The public-school system of this city does not authorize it. It will not do for the advocates of this measure to call upon me to show the law; the affirmative is with them; they have the laboring oar. Let them show any authority under the law for the erection of this building.

If I were ever called upon to show that there is not such authority, I might refer to the fact that in 1872 an act was passed by the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia (and it is the law at this time) the title of which was "An act providing for the purchase of certain ground east of the Capitol, and for the erection thereon of a public market house." Subsequently there was passed another act, "An act providing for the purchase of certain market sites and the erection thereon of certain markets." Then there was another act, the act of June 19, 1872, entitled "An act directing the governor to purchase as a site for a northern market the ground in square 446 offered by W. W. Corcoran, esq."

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. SAMFORD. From an act passed June 19, 1872.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Passed by whom?

Mr. SAMFORD. By the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Not by Congress?

Mr. SAMFORD. By the Legislative Assembly of this District. It was entirely within the jurisdiction of that Legislative Assembly to pass such an act, and it is the law to-day. I have here a statement of the action on this subject. I have not had an opportunity myself to verify the correctness of this statement; but it has been handed to me by a gentleman who has done so. The act to which I have just referred authorized the governor "to purchase as a site for a northern market the ground in square 446, offered by W. W. Corcoran, esq., on the liberal and munificent terms proposed by him," which terms were to sell the ground to the District for a market site for $100,000, and to donate the bonds to be received in payment to the Corcoran Gallery of Art. The ground was purchased, and the bonds at once turned over by Mr. Corcoran to the trustees of the Art Gallery. The act further provided for a commission to make a contract and cause a market building to be erected, and made provision for the issue and sale of bonds for that purpose. The contract was made. That law still exists; and this appropriation bill proposes an absolute change of that law, while it does not retrench expenditures.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. The paragraph under discussion, and which the gentleman includes in his point of order, involves two propositions: one to erect a high-school building, and the other to fix the location upon which this building shall be erected. Now, it is not denied, I presume, by the gentleman from Alabama, or anybody else, that this Congress has the right in an appropriation bill of this kind to make an appropriation for the erection of a public-school building. This was done in the appropriation bill last year, and is done every year by this House. It is the only way in which it is done, and practically it is the only way in which it can be reached. The appropriation bill of last year provided for the erection of three school buildings, one of which was erected on the very lot now under discussion.

The gentleman himself does not deny we have the right to erect a public-school building, but he undertakes to say a high-school building is not a public-school building. It seems to me in any northern city or any northern State that would be almost absurd, for a high school is as much a part of the public system as the primary schools themselves. I venture to say further there is not a city of 50,000 inhabitants in any of the Northern States which has not a high school as part of its public-school system. It is impossible for us to decide, therefore, as it seems to me, that a high school is not a public school.

That leaves, then, the only other question involved, as to whether we have the right to locate this school-house on this square 446. The gentleman claims it changes existing law, and he cites in proof of that a certain act passed by the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia. Now, the gentleman from Alabama ought to know—and I am not sure whether he does or not—that the supreme court of the District of Columbia has decided this very quesiton. When the commissioners undertook to build a public school on that lot an injunction was sought from the court on the ground that the Legislative Assembly had dedicated this square to market purposes. That court, however, decided it had done nothing of the sort, and that the District had an undoubted and unconditional title to the land.

Mr. SAMFORD. I concur with the gentleman from Rhode Island that it is entirely within the power of Congress to do this thing by proper legislation, but the question before the House at this time is whether you can do this thing on an appropriation bill, which, under the rules, I deny.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. There is no law dedicating it to any other purpose. The court decided the legislation to which the gentleman has alluded as void and of no effect, and that the District of Columbia had an undoubted and unconditional title to the land.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now decide the point of order. By reference to Rule XI of the House, clause 30, it will be found that this bill was taken from the jurisdiction of the Committee on the District of Columbia and given to the regular Committee on Appropriations of the House. It is therefore one of the regular general appropriation bills. And that leads to the question what a general appropriation bill is. As I understand it, it is an annual appropriation by Congress for subjects provided by previous law. The first part of clause 3 of Rule XXI provides that no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. A general appropriation bill, then, is an annual appropriation bill for carrying on the Government. Is the erection of a high-school building in the District of Columbia an annual appropriation? To my mind it clearly is not.

It is claimed, because Congress has control of the subject of schools in the District of Columbia, that leaves with it as a part of the law the power to erect a school building, because schools are provided for by pre-existing law. It may be said that courts are provided for by pre-existing law in all parts of the United States, and yet no one would claim that by virtue of the law creating courts an appropriation for the erection of a court-house would be considered a portion of the annual general appropriation bill. This to my mind is clearly new legislation, and is therefore subject to the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Do I understand the Chair to rule that an appropriation for the erection of a new public-school building would not be in order on this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it is not in order under the rule.

Mr. NEAL. I wish to make a point of order on all this bill from line 471; for if we cannot have a high-school building we do not want any.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I feel constrained, Mr. Chairman, to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is glad to have the gentleman do so, as he would like to have the decision of the committee upon the question.

Mr. COBB. Now, Mr. Chairman, I cannot place my hand at this moment upon the law authorizing this appropriation to be made; but I am quite sure when the Chair comes to see that law he will modify his decision on the point involved. There is an act grading the schools of the District, and I will call the attention of the Chair to that law which I think will cause him to modify his decision.

Mr. HUNTON. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUNTON. The Chair has ruled upon this question already. Now, the only thing for us to do is to go on and consider the remainder of the bill unless an appeal is taken from that decision. I hold that debate is not in order after the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island having appealed from the decision of the Chair the question before the committee is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. BRIGHT. I would like to have that part of the bill comprehended in the ruling of the Chair read again, so that we may understand exactly the question pending.

The paragraph was again read.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Can I be allowed a moment upon this question? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be very glad to hear the gentleman from Rhode Island if he was permitted to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. I believe the gentleman from Rhode Island has a right under the rules in Committee of the Whole to address the Chair upon this point. I claim that it is his right and was settled the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman unless there be objection.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Mr. Chairman, this is a subject of importance. It should be decided only after mature reflection and consideration. The question presented here is whether or not this is a general appropriation bill. I hold that an appropriation for the District of Columbia is of necessity a private appropriation, a bill providing for a municipality under the control of the Government, and if we exact under this first clause of the twenty-first rule that every appropriation not provided for previously by law is out of order, we shall exclude nine-tenths of all the items in appropriation bills brought into this House by the Committee on Appropriations.

We cannot embark in any new enterprise in the District unless we first pass a law to authorize it, and then get the consent of the Committee on Appropriations to furnish the money. It is well known to every member of this House that it is impossible for us to do that. We shall never have any school-houses erected here or work of any kind done in this District if this rule is to be strictly adhered to and enforced. I have at present no authorities before me on this point, but I shall be very much surprised if the District appropriation bill has ever been decided to be a general appropriation bill within the meaning of the first clause of the twenty-first rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 91.

Mr. TALBOTT demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TALBOTT, and Mr. ALDRICH of Rhode Island, were appointed.

Mr. FINLEY. I hope the Chair will state distinctly the question upon which the committee is now called upon to vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama made a point of order that the provision contained in this bill which contemplates the erection of a high-school building was not an appropriation authorized by law, and should not under the rules of the House be included in this bill. That point of order was sustained by the Chair. The gentleman from Rhode Island appeals from that decision of the Chair, and the question is, Shall that decision stand as the judgment of the committee?

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 78, noes 101.

So the decision of the Chair was overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out from line 471 to 498, inclusive, and insert "and the commissioners are hereby authorized to sell the 3.65 bonds which are held by them in trust as a school fund, amounting to $70,630.47, and apply the proceeds to the erection of two school buildings on sites and according to plans approved by the board of school trustees. Said plans to be furnished and the work to be superintended by the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia."

Mr. KLOTZ. But not to be erected on square 446.

Mr. HUNTON. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to have the attention of the committee for a few moments while I explain the provisions of the amendment which I have offered. I have been charged, sir, with being an advocate of extravagance in the amendments which I have had the honor of offering and pressing upon the committee for adoption. I now claim that my amendment is in the interest of economy, and I want the gentleman from Indiana to understand that if he opposes the amendment he himself will be the advocate of extravagance and I of economy. The committee will observe, Mr. Chairman, that by the two paragraphs that my amendment proposes to strike out $170,000 is appropriated to the building of school-houses in the District of Columbia in one single fiscal year, an amount for the purpose of school buildings never appropriated within my legislative experience in this body; and I say an amount far beyond the ability of the people of the District under present circumstances to pay. I desire to say here, sir, that I am an advocate of common-school education. I am as perfectly willing as any gentleman upon this floor by my action here and by my vote to provide everything that is necessary for the education of the children of the District of Columbia in the public schools; but I am not willing in any given year to spend such a vast sum as this contemplates—$170,000—for the purpose of building free schools, one of which is to cost $70,000 alone.

Mr. SAMFORD. Not counting the value of the property on which it is erected.

Mr. HUNTON. And when you take into consideration the value of the lot, as my friend from Alabama suggests, it is probably in the neighborhood of two hundred thousand dollars. It is now, Mr. Chairman, I think, the duty of Congress to provide gradually for the erection of the school-houses necessary for the accommodation of the children of the District, but not to do it all in one bill or in one year, by attempting to provide so much as this bill contemplates for the purpose of erecting these buildings. The committee will recollect, when the amendment was offered and adopted to increase the appropriation for taking up the rotten wooden pavements and replacing them with substantial ones of some kind, it was understood that there was to be an economical cutting down somewhere else in the bill to get it within the total amount as recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, last year, I believe, we erected three school-houses; the year before, one or two; and now we are asked to build three more, one of which is to cost $70,000. I say, whatever may be the wants of the people of this District in regard to school buildings, they ought for the present to be satisfied with the rooms rented for the purpose, especially as we propose by my amendment to build two school buildings costing $70,000.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. HUNTON.

Mr. HUNTON. My amendment proposes that the 3.65 bonds, amounting to $70,000, shall be paid off and canceled, and that the amount of those bonds held now by the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall be devoted to the building of two school buildings, the site for which shall be determined by the school board under the direction of the commissioners of the District.

I say, Mr. Chairman, with all deference, that this sum of $70,000 is quite enough in one year for the people of the District of Columbia to expend in the erection of school buildings in this District. If the $100,000 appropriated in the first of these paragraphs is stricken out and the appropriation is confined to the $70,000 in 3.65 bonds, then the District of Columbia will have at the end of the next fiscal year two additional school buildings with twenty-four rooms in the aggregate; and the next year we can build two more, and two more the next year, and in time furnish all the schools that are thought to be necessary for the accommodation of the children of the District.

A MEMBER. How much does your amendment save?

Mr. HUNTON. My amendment provides $70,000 instead of $170,000. The two paragraphs to which my amendment applies appropriate $170,000 for the purpose of building school-houses in the District. My amendment cuts off the $100,000 and appropriates the $70,000 now held in 3.65 bonds. And I submit that sum is enough to appropriate in any given year for school buildings in the city of Washington. I trust, therefore, the committee will adopt my amendment.

Mr. COBB. I desire to say but one word. If the gentleman from Virginia will only appropriate $70,000 he ought not to appropriate any. You cannot build one school building for less than $45,000, and the balance, you can readily see, cannot be used for the purpose of erecting such buildings as are now being erected under this system.

The section which the gentleman from Virginia proposes to amend provides for three buildings in the District of Columbia: two in division No. 2, and one in division No. 6. And then there is this high school. As I said yesterday by what is here proposed we will save $8,000 rent which we are now paying in the second school division. And then we propose to take from the upper stories of the Seaton building and the Franklin building these young girls and boys now in the high school and transfer them to this building and to provide room for intermediate schools. We are paying as rent 10 per cent. upon the value of the property rented. We ought to stop this expenditure.

Mr. HUNTON. If the $70,000 are appropriated as proposed in my amendment it is understood one of the two buildings to be erected is needed most in the country and the other in the city. The $70,000 will build two school-houses, one costing from $30,000 to $40,000 in the city, and the other in the country.

Mr. COBB. In the country they only ask $4,000.

Mr. HUNTON. I understand more than that is desired.

Mr. HENKLE. Before the vote is taken upon the pending amendment I want to say a few words upon this market question, which I consider is embraced under the provisions of the amendment now pending.

The gentleman from Indiana, who recently addressed the committee, entered at considerable length on the merits of this question, and made some reflection, as I thought at least, upon the character of a mass-meeting of the citizens of Washington that was held last night upon this subject. The reflection was that the parties composing that meeting were interested in such a manner as was not creditable to their moral character; that they were interested in the sale of intoxicating liquors; that it was a sinister movement altogether; that it was a pecuniary, selfish interest that controlled these people; that their voice was not entitled, therefore, to consideration on the part of Congress.

Now, I desire to send to the Clerk's desk to be read a memorial that has been sent to Congress by these gentlemen, remarking at the same time that the gentlemen composing that meeting last night are among the most respectable men in the District of Columbia, and are entitled to take the interest in this matter which they do, and that as such they are entitled to the consideration of this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The residents of the northern part of the city of Washington, who are accommodated by the market established by law on square 446, commonly known as "Corcoran square," having met together in mass-meeting to consider the great injury and wrong which they would suffer by the passage of that portion of the appropriation bill for the District of Columbia reported to the House of Representatives on the 26th instant, which provides for the location of a high-school building on the ground now used for a market, and which would involve the taking away of the only convenient market facilities which we now enjoy, do respectfully but most earnestly memorialize your honorable bodies, and represent:

First. That in 1871 and 1872 the Legislative Assembly of the District provided for the purchase of three market sites in the city of Washington—one in the eastern, one in the western, and one in the northern section of the city, and for the erection of permanent market houses thereon. On the eastern and western sites market houses have been built and paid for out of the general treasury of the District, whereby we and our property have paid our proportion for them. The ground in question was purchased as the northern market site, and temporary sheds and stands were erected thereon, and they have served for eight years, and notwithstanding their inadequacy to our needs, have been a great convenience and have yielded to the District treasury a larger revenue than any other public market in the city. Moreover, the real estate in this section of the city, by reason of the location of the market therein, has been assessed for taxation at a much higher valuation than theretofore; so that, besides having paid our proportion for the other two markets, we have also paid, by increased taxes, more than enough to reimburse the District for the cost of the ground.

Second. The site is absolutely needed for a market, and is better located and adapted therefor than any other in the whole northern section of the city, which is shown by the business which has been and still is done at these temporary and inadequate market-sheds, and is further demonstrated by the strenuous and persistent efforts of the owners of private corporation markets, which are claimed to be, but are not, so located as to afford us convenient market accommodations, to procure the diversion of the ground from the purpose for which it was purchased and set apart by law.

Third. The ground was, after the fullest discussion of the question, selected for a northern market, and was purchased from Mr. Corcoran with the understanding between him and the citizens of Washington that it should be devoted to market purposes, and that he would donate the proceeds of its sale to the Corcoran Gallery of Art. This he did, and it would be a breach of faith to now divert it to other uses.

Fourth. The District government having failed to erect a permanent market house on this site we became ready and willing, in order to preserve and improve our market facilities, to erect a suitable market building ourselves on the south half of the ground purchased from Mr. Corcoran, in accordance with the provisions of House bill No. 4749, which was reported favorably by the House Committee on the District of Columbia at the last session of Congress, and is now pending in the House, whereby the District will receive a large annual revenue therefrom and the citizens will have increased market facilities, while the north half of the ground will be devoted to school purposes. And this division of the ground was understood to be a satisfactory adjustment of conflicting claims. Since then a school building has been erected on the north half of the ground, with which the market does not interfere, and it is now proposed to take all the ground for school purposes, and at a loss of revenue to the District which would pay the interest on the cost of two or three proper sites for school buildings.

Wherefore we earnestly appeal to your honorable bodies to regard our situation and refrain from passing the pending bill, which will destroy our market, and respectfully pray for the passage of the House bill, to which we have above referred, providing for the erection of a permanent market without cost to the District or the General Government.

And we authorize the chairman and secretary of this mass-meeting to sign this memorial in our behalf.

And will ever pray, &c.

SAMUEL NORMENT,
Chairman.
EDW. W. DONN,
Secretary.

Before the Clerk had finished the reading of the above memorial the hammer fell.

Mr. SAMFORD was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. HENKLE.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the memorial.

Mr. HENKLE. This is no new subject to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It was discussed in a very exhaustive manner by all the parties interested during the last session of Congress, and on several previous occasions. If the committee would give me for a few minutes their attention, which is so difficult a matter to get when business pertaining to the District of Columbia is before the House, I believe I could convince them that this lot should not in equity or justice be taken for the purposes of a high school.

I am not here to oppose a high school in the city of Washington. There is no man in the city or in the District more willing to support education than I am. But I do say, Mr. Chairman, that it is an outrage on the people of the northern section of this city to take that lot and divert it from market-house purposes to the purposes of a high school.

The memorial that has just been read from the desk recites briefly the several points in this case. They are these: that in 1871 or 1872 the Legisative Assembly of the District of Columbia made provision for three public markets: one in the eastern, one in the western, and one located in the northern section of the city.

The Eastern Market House was built; the Western Market House was built. The Corcoran lot was purchased, and the foundation was laid there for the erection of the Northern Market House on that lot. Gentlemen say there is nothing in the deed by which this lot is conveyed to the city that provides that it shall be devoted to the purposes of a market house. I care not whether it was in the letter of the bond or not; it is just as well understood, and it is just as binding in good faith upon this committee and upon Congress to carry out the understanding; for it was known to all men in this District at the time that property was bought that it should be devoted to the purposes of a market house. The proof of that is to be found there in the foundation stones that lie to-day upon that lot. There is the proof, so plain that he who runs may read. It was intended for a market, as is shown by the fact that the District government proceeded to lay the foundation of a market building on that lot.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KLOTZ. I will take the floor, and yield four minutes of my time to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HENKLE.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. HENKLE. Then I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. NEAL. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NEAL. Is it in order under the rules for a gentleman to take the floor and yield his time to another?

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HENKLE] takes the floor in his own time, having moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. NEAL. The chairman ruled a short time ago that I had no right to do that; and what is good for one is good for another.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair held that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] had no right at the close of his remarks to move to strike out the last word and continue on the floor.

Mr. NEAL. That is just exactly what the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HENKLE] has done.

The CHAIRMAN. If that is so, the Chair will rule as he did before.

Mr. KLOTZ. I will move to strike out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from Maryland.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland will proceed.

Mr. HENKLE. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KLOTZ] for his courtesy.

I was going on to say that this property was sold by Mr. Corcoran with the express understanding that it should be devoted to market-house purposes. The Committee on the District of Columbia has undoubted information upon that subject. That committee addressed a note to Mr. Corcoran to ascertain if such was the fact. Mr. Corcoran replied in a letter, which I presume is now in the committee-room, in which he explicitly states that the property was sold to the city with the express understanding that it should be used for market purposes, and for no other purpose.

Now, the citizens of that portion of the District desire a market house on this lot. It is the natural location for a market. Street railways run past it on two sides. It is one of those centers to which population naturally gravitates. It is the natural location for a market. There is the place for one, and though the building is not completed, nothing but the foundation laid, yet such was the general desire for a market house there that temporary sheds were erected, and a successful market has been conducted there from that time to the present. There is a market there to-day, and has been for eight years, a prime necessity to the people of that section of the city.

More than that, in view of the prospective value of property in that section of the city, because of the establishment of a market-house there, prices advanced, property increased in value; and when assessments were made that property was assessed at advanced rates. For years the people of that section of the city have been paying increased taxation because of the enhanced value of their property by reason of the prospective establishment of a market there. Is there anybody here who doubts that? Is there any one cognizant of the condition of affairs in that portion of the city who does not know that to be true? I say it would be bad faith to take this property from them and use it for the purpose of a school-house.

This matter was discussed at great length in our committee. We heard the citizens of that portion of the city, as well as the representatives of the incorporated market houses referred to by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBB.] The owners of those market houses said they had built them with their own money. That was at the time when a proposition was made to appropriate money by Congress to erect a market house on this Corcoran square.

The owners of the other market houses said they had built their markets with their own money; that if the people would build a market house on this square with their own money they might do it. The only objection was to the Government appropriating money to construct a market house there and break down these private enterprises.

A compromise was then and there agreed to in our committee which was conceded to be satisfactory to all parties, to the people of that portion of the District, to the commissioners of the District, and to these rival corporations also. The proposition was that if the people would build a market on this square at their own private expense, just as the other market-houses had been built, there would be no objection to it. A bill was accordingly prepared for that purpose, and is before the House to-day.

That is the state of the case now. That was the compromise reached. The Committee on Appropriations now come in and ask this House to divert this property from the purpose for which it was originally designed, to break up this market, which is a public necessity for all that northern section of the city, and to erect a high-school building on the property.

Now, I am in favor of a high school, but I am not in favor of doing any injustice that good may come from it. I say let justice be done, though the heavens fall. There are better locations in this city for a high school. This lot is not centrally located, either geographically or with reference to population. Now, why do I say this?

Provision was made by law that there should be one market house in the eastern portion of the city, one in the western portion, and one in the northern portion of the city. And this site was selected as the one for the market house for the benefit of the people in the northern section of the city. That does not indicate that it is central. It is not central. The center of population is east of Sixth street. All the southern and eastern part of the city, including the navy-yard, is remote from this location. If you build a high school, as I hope you may, I want you to locate it where it will be accessible to the poor people of the District.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, I desire that we shall now give a hearing to parties who have not yet been heard. I send to the desk to be read the proceedings of a public meeting held on the 7th of the present month, in favor of public schools. I ask gentlemen to notice the names of gentlemen who took part in this meeting, and say whether they are representative men of this District.

The Clerk read as follows:

A District high-school—Meeting of citizens to recommend its erection—A memorial adopted which will be presented to the commissioners and Congress—Expression of opinion on the subject.

Pursuant to a published call, a number of patrons and friends of the public-school system, who favor the erection of a suitable building for a District high school, met at Seaton school building last night. About thirty-five persons were present, among them Commissioner Dent, Superintendent Wilson, Trustee Lovejoy, A. P. Clarke, W. C. Chase, B. T. Swartz, Joseph Daniels, S. John Thomson, B. Janney, Ex-Trustee Joseph M. Wilson, Ex-Trustee G. Y. At Lee, J. B. Ourand, and others.

On motion of General W. W. Birney, Hon. Matthew G. Emery was called to the chair, and B. F. Marche was elected secretary. A motion was made and carried that a committee of five be appointed to draw up a proper address, setting forth the necessity for a high school in this District. The Chair appointed as such committee General W. W. Birney, General R. B. Mussey, John Randolph, C. E. Hovey, and George Mason. After being out for some time the committee returned, and General Birney reported a series of resolutions, as follows:

Whereas the trustees of the public schools of this District have not yet been able to establish the eleventh and twelfth grades, which are necessary to the thorough training and instruction for practical life contemplated by the public-school system, and which grades have been established in Baltimore, Richmond, Savannah, and generally in the cities of the United States; and

Whereas said trustees, not finding it practicable to rent a suitable building for the ninth and tenth grades, have been compelled to locate them in the third stories of buildings constructed for the use of lower grades, inconvenient for higher ones and contracted in space; and

Whereas the present pupils of the tenth grade will be compelled to leave the public schools at the end of the scholastic year because no provision has been made for their further instruction, and a large number of the present pupils of the eighth grade, desiring to enter the ninth must be refused admission because there is room for a limited number only; and

Whereas the board of school trustees demand immediate attention to this state of things, declaring it to be most serious, and recommend the application of what is known as the "Washington school fund," amounting with interest to more than seventy-two thousand dollars, to the erection of a building for the use of the highest grades, and also that said building be erected on ground belonging to the District in square 446, which site they pronounce central, accessible and available:

Resolved, That the recommendations of the board of trustees are reasonable, and ought to be carried out without delay.

That the "Washington school fund" should not be diverted to the use or benefit of any one or two school divisions, but should be applied to the erection of a building for those grades in which all parts of the District are represented.

That we rely with confidence upon the usual appropriation by Congress for the construction of buildings for the lower grades of public schools; and we trust this appropriation will not interfere with the application of the "Washington school fund" as recommended by the trustees.

That the board of trustees of public schools merit our thanks for their efforts in the face of many difficulties, to establish in this District the system of co-education of all the children of the community—a system just to the feeble and defenseless, and which has been proved to be the best preservative of republican institutions by removing prejudices between rich and poor, mitigating sectarian feeling, and promoting industrial prosperity by the multiplication of inventors, able mechanics, engineers, skillful merchants, and intelligent workmen.

That a committee of fifteen citizens be appointed by this meeting to present these resolutions to the honorable District commissioners; to confer with them on the subject-matter with a view to secure favorable action; and to take such other steps, including presentation to the congressional committee having charge of District affairs, as it may deem necessary to carry out the views of this meeting.

General Birney made a speech defending the high-school system. He said that he saw a sentiment in the press some time ago against it. The high school was not for the rich, but to make all competent to earn a livelihood. It is intended to fill a place in the public schools. [A voice: "Don't let it be understood that no languages are to be taught."]

J. B. Johnston spoke in favor of the resolutions.

Judge Dent said there was a great difference of opinion as to the degree of public-school teaching. If there was any place in which the public schools should have a high standard, this city was the place. He spoke of the poor financial condition of the District, and said the schools did not, on that account, receive as much as the commissioners would like them to have. He went on to say that Congress had given them, on their recommendation, the Washington school fund, $72,000, and about thirty thousand dollars for school purposes. He suggested that the school board could either appropriate the money to the erection of low or high schools.

General R. B. Mussey spoke in favor of the resolutions at some length, saying that Washington had more material for high education than any city in the country. He said he had rather have had bad pavements than bad boys, and the way to do away with the latter was to give them school facilities.

Judge Dent again spoke of the trouble of collecting money, and said if this meeting would have the $192,000 of drawbacks placed to the credit of the District he would pledge himself to vote $150,000 for the public schools.

Ex-Treasurer Wilson spoke in favor of the resolutions, saying that Representative COBB was in favor of doing all he could to give them a high school.

General E. F. Hovey said the question had resolved itself into one of ease to the pedal extremity of man, or knowledge to the head; or, in other words, if we have good streets we are to have no high school. So much money was to be expended, according to the commissioners, and he favored giving it to the high school. He concluded by saying that both the streets and the high school could be attended to by properly presenting the case before Congress.

The resolutions were then unanimously adopted, and the Chair appointed the following committee to wait on the commissioners and Congress: M. G. Emery, William Birney, H. D. Cooke, jr., W. C. Dodge, William Dickson, Thomas J. Hume, Rev. George O. Little, William H. Chase, O. H. Irish, R. D. Mussey, J. B. Johnson, George C. Gorham, Lewis Clephane, A. J. Donaldson, B. T. Swart, and Rev. B. F. Bittinger, D. D. The committee will meet at the Second National Bank on Monday morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. SAMFORD. I would like to have read a letter which I send to the desk from the gentleman who presided over the meeting, the proceedings of which have just been read.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. KLOTZ. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. SAMFORD. I renew it, and I ask the Clerk to read the letter which I send up.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECOND NATIONAL BANK,
Washington, D. C., January 27, 1881.

MY DEAR SIR: While I am in favor of the erection of a building for high-school purposes, I am not in favor of placing it upon square No. 446, known as Corcoran square. I think there should be a market house erected on this square.

Yours, respectfully,

M. G. EMERY.

Major THOS. P. MORGAN,
District Commissioner.

Mr. SAMFORD. I ask to have read also a communication from Major Morgan, one of the District commissioners.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 27, 1881.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your inquiry, as to the commissioners having given their consent to the erection of a public school on the south side of square 446, or that they had recommended the same, I would state that personally I have always been opposed to diverting this property from its original purpose, for markets, to any other.

As to the erection of the proposed high school on the square named, I have been opposed to it all along, and so expressed myself to all who made any inquiry. I talked the matter over with Mr. COBB a few days since, and expressed to him fully my objections, but said if it was determined to build a high school and use square 446, I would advise the sale of the ground on the Seventh street side, included in seven lots—shown on a plat I gave him—and purchase more retired and cheaper ground northwest from this point.

Sincerely,

THOS. P. MORGAN.

Hon. Mr. SAMFORD.

N. B.—The commissioners, as a board, have never recommended anything touching this subject.

Mr. SAMFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is now on file in the proper department of this House a petition signed by 2,000 citizens, which was referred to the District Committee, praying that this lot No. 446 might not be diverted from its original purpose.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. What was that?

Mr. SAMFORD. It was originally devoted to the erection of a market house. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HENKLE,] has had read the proceedings of a very large and intelligent meeting held last night. I do not wish at this late hour to say anything in addition to what has been so well said by the gentleman from Maryland, except this: this whole question was before the Committee on the District of Columbia; it was discussed there time and again. The interests of the common schools and the interests of the market seemed to conflict, and after a most exhaustive argument and a personal inspection of the ground by various members of the committee a compromise was reached, and a vote was had directing the reporting of a bill (it is true there were members of the committee who never gave their consent to the bill, and who voted against it)—a bill providing that one-half of this lot be taken for market-house purposes and the other half for public-school purposes.

Allow me to add that there are now outstanding bonds to the amount of $100,000, issued in payment for this square, upon which bonds this District is paying annually an interest of $7,000. These parties propose to erect a market-house on this square without any expense whatever to the Government; and they propose to insure the payment of sufficient rent to meet a proper proportionate part of the interest upon those bonds, besides paying the taxes upon the buildings which they may erect. But the bill now before the House—not the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, for I am in favor of that—the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations, proposes, in devoting this square to school purposes, not only that the District shall continue to pay the $7,000 interest on those bonds, but it proposes an appropriation of $70,000 additional.

I do not propose to go over the argument, but it is a fact of history that this lot was bought under and by virtue of a legislative act of the District of Columbia for the purposes of a market; and just as soon as it was bought a large number of citizens settled around it, whose property was supposed to be enhanced in value by this proposed location of a market-house, and they have paid additional taxation by reason of this enhanced valuation.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, the fact is that for a year past certain parties interested in the seizure of public property for private purposes have besieged the Committee on the District of Columbia day and night for the purpose of having this property appropriated for market purposes. The committee considered the question; they heard the arguments of these parties and their attorneys; and a majority of the committee voted against anything of this sort. The bill which the gentleman from Alabama speaks of was never brought before this House by a vote of the majority of the District Committee. So much for that.

Mr. SAMFORD. Certainly the gentleman will not deny that a majority of a quorum of the committee authorized the reporting of that bill to the House—a bill prepared and offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KLOTZ.]

Mr. NEAL. I say that a majority of the committee never authorized the reporting of that bill. A majority of a quorum may have done so; but I for one never knew that the bill had been reported until it was brought up here the other night for action. So much for that.

Now, as to another point. It is claimed that because this square was bought from Mr. Corcoran for market purposes, therefore there was a dedication of it to such purposes. Why, sir, the District received a deed in fee-simple for the property, and paid for it double and treble its value. Now, what is proposed? In the first place, Mr. Chairman, these parties wanted us to appropriate the whole square to the building of market houses. Then they came down to a proposition to take one-half. They proposed that this public property should be appropriated for private purposes, when, as has been demonstrated by the gentleman from Indiana, there are ample market facilities in that neighborhood, so that there is no necessity for another market. The full object of this will be to give public property to private persons to enable them to compete with other private enterprises. More than $100,000 has been spent in that neighborhood by one market company, and a large sum by another market company, and the question now addresses itself to this committee, will they appropriate public money for the purpose of feeding men's bellies as the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Alabama desire, or will they go with us and devote it to the purpose of supplying food to the minds and souls of the children of this District?

Gentlemen have insinuated there were interested parties back of this urging it on. I will say to the gentlemen for myself and for every member of the Committee on the District of Columbia who stands as I do on this question, that the only persons who have talked to us in regard to this matter are the men who come here and ask us to give them public property for private purposes. These public market houses are behind the age. In modern times no town appropriates money for any such purpose. Let all these matters be left to individual enterprise.

Further, Mr. Chairman, if you do not use this lot for the purpose indicated, then we shall have to buy private property upon which to erect a high-school building.

Mr. SAMFORD. Let me correct the gentleman. I am in favor of a high school no matter where you put it, provided you do not take this property for that purpose.

Mr. NEAL. Oh, yes; you want us to give public property for private purposes.

Mr. SAMFORD. No, sir.

Mr. NEAL. There is not a single piece of public property in this District that some piratical white man has not placed his covetous eyes upon. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I take the floor in my own right and will yield my time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. NEAL. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. Chairman, I say there is not a piece of public property anywhere in this District that some white men do not want for private purposes. Here we have two hundred thousand dollars' worth of public property occupied by a railroad company for depot purposes. Here, too, is the Washington Market-house Company, which has its clutches on a large piece of valuable public domain. So it is with everything else. When, however, it is proposed to put a library building on public property there is a howl raised all over the District, you must not do anything of the sort. When private individuals come and ask us to give them public property for private purposes they have advocates upon this floor who throw out insinuations against other members not warranted by the facts within their knowledge.

Mr. ATHERTON. Is it claimed this property when used as a public market is used for private purposes? Is not a public market as much a public purpose as anything else here?

Mr. NEAL. This is for the purpose of a private market.

Mr. ATHERTON. Is it not for a public market?

Mr. HENKLE. Let me ask whether they do not propose to pay for this lot?

Mr. NEAL. I cannot be interrupted. I want to say to the gentleman we have no right to rent private property for market purpose or any other private purpose. If you do not use this lot for the purpose of this high-school building, then you will have to go somewhere else and buy other property for that purpose. That is what you will have to do, and when you are compelled to do that you will have to pay a high price for improved property. The improvements will have been assessed upon the property, and you will have to pay two or three times over for it.

I appeal now to this House, once for all, to set apart this property for the laudable purpose of educating the youth of Washington City and preparing them properly to discharge the duties and obligations resting upon them as citizens of the greatest and most glorious commonwealth the sun ever shone upon.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say a word on this subject. I am a man of peace. [Laughter.] I want to throw oil upon the troubled waters of this committee. If my amendment is adopted this whole fight about Corcoran square is ended and will only come up in the bill which my friend from Alabama has in charge. So if my amendment is adopted this whole question about Corcoran square is out of this appropriation bill and will be left to the bill hereafter to be reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. NEAL. Will not that committee report it as a separate bill to be again fought over?

Mr. HUNTON. It will come as a separate bill, but it will come in a bill from the Committee on the District of Columbia, from which such matters ought to come, and it will settle the matter as far as that committee is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands informal amendments are withdrawn, and the question therefore recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON.]

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 85.

Mr. KLOTZ. No quorum has voted.

Mr. PAGE. I demand tellers.

Mr. VALENTINE. Pending that I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move the House do now adjourn.

PRINTING.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion the Chair will ask unanimous consent for the adoption of an order which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That all bills, joint resolutions, and concurrent resolutions relating to printing, and now remaining on the Speaker's table, be taken therefrom and referred to the Committee on Printing.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 143) authorizing the inspection and issue of an American register to the Egyptian steamship Dessoug.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relative to the Hot Springs reservation in Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF HON. EVARTS W. FARR.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask consent at this time to introduce a resolution touching the funeral expenses of the late Representative from New Hampshire, Hon. Evarts W. Farr.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House a sum sufficient to pay the necessary funeral expenses of Hon. Evarts W. Farr, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SIMONTON. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows, viz:

By Mr. ATHERTON: The petitions of Enoch Perego and 50 others, of C. W. Long and 17 others, of L. B. Lee and 45 others, of Silas P. Rogers and 60 others, and of C. W. Colliflourrs and 42 others, citizens of Ohio, for the passage of an income-tax law—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petitions of the same parties and others, for legislation to protect innocent purchasers of patented articles—to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petitions of the same parties and others, that the Commissioner of Agriculture be made a member of the President's Cabinet—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, the petitions of the same parties and others, for legislation on the subject of interstate commerce—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BURROWS: The petition of L. D. Wheeler and others, citizens of Michigan, for legislation on the subject of interstate commerce—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of the same parties, for legislation that will protect innocent purchasers of patented articles—to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petition of the same parties, for the passage of an income-tax law—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of the same parties, that the Commissioner of Agriculture be made a Cabinet officer—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, the petition of citizens of Michigan, against the passage of Senate bill No. 496—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CARPENTER: The petition of Peter Demarest, of Iowa, against the passage of the sixty-surgeons bill, and for the passage of the Geddes bill—to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 2, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REMOVAL OF PONCA INDIANS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the request of a large number of intelligent and benevolent citizens, and believing that it was warranted by the extraordinary circumstances of the case, on the 18th day of December, 1880, I appointed a commission consisting of George Crook and Nelson A. Miles, brigadier-generals in the Army, William Stickney, of the District of Columbia, and Walter Allen, of Massachusetts, and requested them to confer with the Ponca Indians in the Indian Territory, and if, in their judgment, it was advisable, also with that part of the tribe which remained in Dakota, and "to ascertain the facts in regard to their removal and present condition so far as was necessary to determine the question as to what justice and humanity require should be done by the Government of the United States, and to report their conclusions and recommendations in the premises."

The commission, in pursuance of these instructions, having visited the Ponca Indians at their homes in the Indian Territory and in Dakota, and made a careful investigation of the subject referred to them, have reported their conclusions and recommendations, and I now submit their report, together with the testimony taken, for the consideration of Congress. A minority report by Mr. Allen is also herewith submitted.

On the 27th of December, 1880, a delegation of Ponca chiefs from the Indian Territory presented to the Executive a declaration of their wishes, in which they stated that it was their desire "to remain on the lands now occupied by the Poncas in the Indian Territory," and "to relinquish all their right and interest in the lands formerly owned and occupied by the Ponca tribe in the State of Nebraska and the Territory of Dakota;" and the declaration sets forth the compensation which they will accept for the lands to be surrendered, and for the injuries done to the tribe by their removal to the Indian Territory. This declaration, agreeably to the request of the chiefs making it, is herewith transmitted to Congress.

The public attention has frequently been called to the injustice and wrong which the Ponca tribe of Indians has suffered at the hands of the Government of the United States. This subject was first brought before Congress and the country by the Secretary of the Interior in his annual report for the year 1877, in which he said:

> The case of the Poncas seems entitled to especial consideration at the hands of Congress. They have always been friendly to the whites. It is said, and, as far as I have been able to learn, truthfully, that no Ponca ever killed a white man. The orders of the Government always met with obedient compliance at their hands. Their removal from their old homes on the Missouri River was to them a great hardship. They had been born and raised there. They had houses there in which they lived according to their ideas of comfort. Many of them had engaged in agriculture, and possessed cattle and agricultural implements. They were very reluctant to leave all this, but when Congress had resolved upon their removal they finally overcame that reluctance and obeyed. Considering their constant good conduct, their obedient spirit, and the sacrifices they have made, they are certainly entitled to more than ordinary care at the hands of the Government, and I urgently recommend that liberal provision be made to aid them in their new settlement.

In the same volume the report of E. A. Howard, the agent of the Poncas, is published, which contains the following:

> I am of the opinion that the removal of the Poncas from the northern climate of Dakota to the southern climate of the Indian Territory, at the season of the year it was done, will prove a mistake, and that a great mortality will surely follow among the people when they shall have been here for a time and become poisoned with the malaria of the climate. Already the effects of the climate may be seen upon them in the ennui that seems to have settled upon each, and in the large number now sick.
> It is a matter of astonishment to me that the Government should have ordered the removal of the Ponca Indians from Dakota to the Indian Territory without having first made some provision for their settlement and comfort. Before their removal was carried into effect an appropriation should have been made by Congress sufficient to have located them in their new home, by building a comfortable house for the occupancy of every family of the tribe. As the case now is, no appropriation has been made by Congress, except for a sum but little more than sufficient to remove them; no houses have been built for their use, and the result is that these people have been placed on an uncultivated reservation to live in their tents as best they may, and await further legislative action.
> These Indians claim that the Government had no right to move them from their reservation without first obtaining from them by purchase or treaty the title which they had acquired from the Government, and for which they rendered a valuable consideration. They claim that the date of the settlement of their tribe upon the land composing their old reservation is prehistoric; that they were all born there, and that their ancestors from generations back beyond their knowledge were born and lived upon its soil, and that they finally acquired a complete and perfect title from the Government by treaty made with the "Great Father" at Washington, which they claimed made it as legitimately theirs as is the home of the white man acquired by gift or purchase.

The subject was again referred to in similar terms in the annual report of the Interior Department for 1878, in the reports of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and of the agent for the Poncas, and in 1879 the Secretary of the Interior said:

> That the Poncas were grievously wronged by their removal from their location on the Missouri River to the Indian Territory, their old reservation having, by a mistake in making the Sioux treaty, been transferred to the Sioux, has been at length and repeatedly set forth in my reports as well as those of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. All that could be subsequently done by this Department in the absence of new legislation to repair that wrong and to indemnify them for their losses has been done with more than ordinary solicitude. They were permitted to select a new location for themselves in the Indian Territory, the Quapaw reserve, to which they had first been taken, being objectionable to them. They chose a tract of country on the Arkansas River and the Salt Fork northwest of the Pawnee reserve. I visited their new reservation personally to satisfy myself of their condition. The lands they now occupy are among the very best in the Indian Territory in point of fertility, well watered and well timbered, and admirably adapted for agriculture as well as stock-raising. In this respect their new reservation is unquestionably superior to that which they left behind them on the Missouri River. Seventy houses have been built by and for them of far better quality than the miserable huts they formerly occupied in Dakota, and the construction of a larger number is now in progress, so that, as the agent reports, every Ponca family will be comfortably housed before January. A very liberal allowance of agricultural implements and stock-cattle has been given them, and if they apply themselves to agricultural work there is no doubt that their condition will soon be far more prosperous than it has ever been before. During the first year after their removal to the Indian Territory they lost a comparatively large number of their people by death in consequence of the change of climate, which is greatly to be deplored; but their sanitary condition is now very much improved. The death rate among them during the present year has been very low, and the number of cases of sickness is constantly decreasing. It is thought that they are now sufficiently acclimated to be out of danger.

A committee of the Senate, after a very full investigation of the subject, on the 31st of May, 1880, reported their conclusions to the Senate, and both the majority and minority of the committee agreed that "a great wrong had been done to the Ponca Indians." The majority of the committee says:

> Nothing can strengthen the Government in a just policy to the Indians so much as a demonstration of its willingness to do ample and complete justice whenever it can be shown that it has inflicted a wrong upon a weak and trusting tribe. It is impossible for the United States to hope for any confidence to be reposed in them by the Indian until there shall be shown on their part a readiness to do justice.

The minority report is equally explicit as to the duty of the Government to repair the wrong done the Poncas. It says:

> We should be more prompt and anxious because they are weak and we are strong. In my judgment we should be liberal to the verge of lavishness in the expenditure of our money to improve their condition, so that they and all others may know that, although like all nations and all men we may do wrong, we are willing to make ample reparation.

The report of the commission appointed by me, of which General Crook was chairman, and the testimony taken by them and their investigations add very little to what was already contained in the official reports of the Secretary of the Interior and the report of the Senate committee touching the injustice done to the Poncas by their removal to the Indian Territory. Happily, however, the evidence reported by the commission and their recommendations point out conclusively the true measures of redress which the Government of the United States ought now to adopt.

The commission in its conclusions omit to state the important facts as to the present condition of the Poncas in the Indian Territory, but the evidence they have reported shows clearly and conclusively that the Poncas now residing in that Territory, five hundred and twenty-one in number, are satisfied with their new homes; that they are healthy, comfortable, and contented, and that they have freely and firmly decided to adhere to the choice announced in their letter of October 25, 1880, and in the declaration of December 27, 1880, to remain in the Indian Territory and not to return to Dakota.

The evidence reported also shows that the fragment of the Ponca tribe—perhaps one hundred and fifty in number—which is still in Dakota and Nebraska prefer to remain on their old reservation.

In view of these facts I am convinced that the recommendations of the commission, together with the declaration of the chiefs of December last, if substantially followed, will afford a solution of the Ponca question which is consistent with the wishes and interests of both branches of the tribe, with the settled Indian policy of the Government, and as nearly as is now practicable with the demands of justice.

Our general Indian policy for the future should embrace the following leading ideas:

1. The Indians should be prepared for citizenship by giving to their young of both sexes that industrial and general education which is required to enable them to be self-supporting and capable of self-protection in a civilized community.

2. Lands should be allotted to the Indians in severalty, inalienable for a certain period.

3. The Indians should have a fair compensation for their lands not required for individual allotments, the amount to be invested with suitable safeguards for their benefit.

4. With these prerequisites secured, the Indians should be made citizens and invested with the rights and charged with the responsibilities of citizenship.

It is therefore recommended that legislation be adopted in relation to the Ponca Indians, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to secure to the individual members of the Ponca tribe, in severalty, sufficient land for their support inalienable for a term of years and until the restriction upon alienation may be removed by the President. Ample time and opportunity should be given to the members of the tribe freely to choose their allotments either on their old or their new reservation.

Full compensation should be made for the lands to be relinquished, for their losses by the Sioux depredations and by reason of their removal to the Indian Territory, the amount not to be less than the sums named in the declaration of the chiefs, made December 27, 1880.

In short, nothing should be left undone to show to the Indians that the Government of the United States regards their rights as equally sacred with those of its citizens.

The time has come when the policy should be to place the Indians as rapidly as practicable on the same footing with the other permanent inhabitants of our country.

I do not undertake to apportion the blame for the injustice done to the Poncas. Whether the Executive or Congress or the public is chiefly in fault is not now a question of practical importance. As the Chief Executive at the time when the wrong was consummated, I am deeply sensible that enough of the responsibility for that wrong justly attaches to me to make it my particular duty and earnest desire to do all I can to give to these injured people that measure of redress which is required alike by justice and by humanity.

RUTHERFORD B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 1, 1881.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The message with the accompanying papers will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Upon consultation with a member of the standing Committee on Indian Affairs and one of my colleagues upon the special committee, it is deemed advisable to ask the reference of the message and accompanying papers to the Select Committee to examine into the circumstances connected with the removal of the Northern Cheyennes from the Sioux Reservation to the Indian Territory, which committee is charged with the consideration of the Ponca question.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make a remark while that motion is pending. I desire to express personally my great gratification at the sentence of the President of the United States with which that message concludes. It is a most manly and magnanimous utterance. The President says, if I correctly heard the concluding sentence of that message, that, without inquiring as to the share of blame which may attach to the Executive or Congress, or to the public, he desires as the Chief Magistrate in whose term of office the wrong which he relates has been consummated, to take upon himself so much of the responsibility as to be specially anxious that full and ample reparation for that wrong shall be made during his own term of office.

The recognition in our Indian policy, the recognition in our dealing with feebler and weaker races, that the question of justice or injustice, the question of manly and magnanimous reparation for injustice, where it has been committed, is a question not of the character of the people upon whom it is inflicted, but a question of the character of the people who commit it, marks a new departure in the conduct of this Government in dealing with races other than that of which this people is chiefly composed. The United States has performed many just acts which will be recorded in history for the admiration of mankind, but the United States has never and will never be greater than when, without fear, without hope of gain, solely as a vindication of justice, it acknowledges and repairs its own wrong.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.]

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with two resolutions of the Senate, the report of the Ute commission and all correspondence between his Department and the Ute commission and between the Department and the governor of Colorado concerning the Ute Indians since the 15th day of June, 1880; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, transmitting, by direction of the Secretary of the Treasury and in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of January 28, 1881, a copy of the report of A. F. Rogers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey on the proposed harbor of refuge for the Pacific coast, together with its accompanying sketch; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I present a memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Des Moines, in the State of Iowa, urging upon Congress the great importance to the welfare of the country generally and to the upper Mississippi River States specially, of the improvement of the channel of the Mississippi River so as to make safer and cheaper the navigation of that great national thoroughfare. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN presented papers relating to the claim of Susan E. Willard for compensation for the use of property by the United States during the late war; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SAUNDERS presented additional papers to accompany the bill (S. No. 1927) for the relief of Colonel Alfred B. Meacham; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WITHERS presented resolutions of a meeting of the citizens of Petersburgh, Virginia, in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at that place, and also for the improvement of the Appomattox River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2075) to amend section 989, Revised Statutes, so as to extend its provision to all officers of the United States in the performance of official acts in which the United States is a party or has an interest, have directed me to report it with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a substitute. I beg to give notice that, as the bill is of importance to the Government, at a very early day I shall ask for its consideration.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2131) appropriating money, to be used under the direction of the Navy Department, to prosecute a search for the steamer Jeannette, of the Arctic exploring expedition, have instructed me to report it with an amendment. I desire that the bill be read by the Secretary, as it is short, for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to it.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to state that this case stands so entirely alone with respect to its claims upon the attention of the Senate that to-morrow morning, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill in preference to any and all other business.

Mr. HEREFORD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1134) to repay to the State of Georgia $27,175.50, money advanced by said State for the defense of her frontiers against the Indians from 1795 to 1818, and not heretofore repaid, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Joint Select Committee on the Yorktown Centennial Celebration, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 139) for the purchase of a sword formerly belonging to George Washington, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1320) for the relief of citizens of Montana who served with the United States troops in the war with the Nez Percés, and for the relief of the heirs of such as were killed in such service, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1741) for the relief of the United States Regulation Fire-Arms Company, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask that that bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 718) to repeal section 3 of chapter 225, Statutes at Large, approved July 24, 1876, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6062) donating certain lands in Lake County, State of Colorado, to the Veteran Union Association of Leadville, for hospital and burial purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 304) for the relief of Richard H. Porter, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALLACE, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 811) referring the claim of William T. Duvall against the United States to the Court of Claims, to report it with the expression of opinion that it ought not to pass, and that it be indefinitely postponed. Mr. Duvall had a contract with the United States for furnishing certain iron-work, &c., for some one of the public buildings, and all his rights that may have been violated were within the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims. He sued the United States in the Court of Claims and got judgment for all that under the law and principles of equity he was entitled to receive. The committee are of opinion that there is no ground on anything that has been disclosed to them for giving him any further relief. They therefore recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FARLEY asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2140) to establish an assay office in the Territory of Arizona; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FARLEY. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. ALLISON. The bill, I think, should go to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FARLEY. I have no particular objection to that reference, except that it has been the custom of the Senate to refer bills of this character to the Committee on Mines and Mining. It is simply to establish an assay office in the Territory of Arizona. A few days ago the Committee on Mines and Mining reported a similar bill to establish an assay office at Saint Louis. Supposing that the Committee on Finance are somewhat overworked I proposed to refer this bill to the Committee on Mines and Mining, not that I have any serious objection to its going to the Committee on Finance, if there is any good reason why it should go there.

Mr. ALLISON. All questions relating to the mints and coinage——

Mr. FARLEY. This is not of that character; the bill does not propose to establish a mint.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the bill does not provide for minting but it provides for an assay office which has a particular relation to the establishment of mints. These questions have always been considered by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Always.

Mr. FARLEY. The bill relates to the question of mines and mining interests, and it strikes me that the Committee on Mines and Mining is the proper committee to which it should be referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa move the reference to the Committee on Finance?

Mr. ALLISON. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first question is upon referring the bill to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. HEREFORD. I am not very jealous as to what bills shall or shall not be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, but being chairman of that committee I deem it my duty to say that I think this bill should be referred to the committee designated by the Senator from California. I cannot see on what principles it ought to be referred to the Committee on Finance. The first question to be ascertained, I presume, by the committee, as to whether there should be an assay office at this, that, or the other point, is whether the amount of mineral produced in that section of the country is sufficient to authorize the expense of an assay office. That question certainly is more particularly under the management, control, and investigation of the Committee on Mines and Mining than any other committee. That knowledge is presumed at least to be with that committee; therefore I cannot see on what ground the reference should be made to the Committee on Finance. I hope that the motion of the Senator from California will prevail.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California, to refer the bill to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 33, noes 13.

Mr. WHYTE (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2141) relating to the aqueduct of the Alexandria Canal Company at Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and to provide a free bridge across the Potomac River on the piers of said aqueduct; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLATT. I ask leave to introduce two bills for the extension of separate letters-patent. Accompanying each bill is a petition setting forth the circumstances under which the extension is asked.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 2142) for the relief of William I. Clark, and a bill (S. No. 2143) for the relief of William I. Clark; which were twice read by their titles respectively, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. BOOTH asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2144) to vacate, annul, and set aside an act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. COCKRELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2145) to amend section 714 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. COKE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1985) to promote the efficiency of the life-saving service, and to encourage the saving of life from shipwreck; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

RICHARD FATHERLY.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senate to take up and to proceed to consider the resolution reported yesterday morning from the Select Committee to take into consideration the state of the law respecting the ascertaining and declaration of the result of the elections of President and Vice-President of the United States.

The resolution was read.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Alabama permit the resolution to be informally laid aside for a matter which I suppose will take but one minute, which the Senator from Arkansas wishes to have disposed of? I ask consent to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate refused to concur by a two-thirds vote in the bill to remove the political disabilities of Mr. Fatherly.

Mr. MORGAN. I will consent that the resolution be informally laid aside with the understanding that it shall be taken up after that matter is disposed of.

Mr. HOAR. I have moved that the vote by which the bill (S. No. 2054) to remove the political disabilities of Richard Fatherly, of Arkansas, was rejected be reconsidered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HOAR. I called attention when the bill was originally before the Senate to what seemed to me a defect in the petition for the bill. The Senator from Arkansas, I understand, has in his possession a new petition which seems to be entirely free from defect; and if he will present that petition now I for one will support his bill. I voted against it before.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask leave to present the petition of Mr. Fatherly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS,
January 25, 1881.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned respectfully petitions your honorable bodies that he may be relieved from all political disabilities imposed on him by the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

I have not held any office since the date of my resignation as military storekeeper of ordnance.

And he will ever pray, &c.

RICHD. FATHERLY.

Mr. HOAR. I will state, in one word, the objection to the old petition was that it merely prayed to be relieved from such disabilities as the petitioner had incurred by a particular course of conduct which manifestly was innocent as he stated it; but now the petitioner simply prays to be relieved from all disabilities. I understand it is a case where the petitioner does not admit that he has done anything which brings him within the provision of the Constitution; but he says in his original petition it is claimed by others that he has. Under such circumstances, it is clear to my mind that it is the duty of Congress to grant relief, even if the person praying for it does not himself admit that he has incurred the disability, because if he is under any disability he cannot hold any public office. People will not vote for him for any public office while they think he is liable to be rejected; the appointing power will not appoint him to any public office if they think he has incurred the disability; and there can be no possible remedy except the act of Congress, for which he prays.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Massachusetts may be correct; I make no issue upon that. The original petition was sent to me by Mr. Fatherly. While it was not very artistically drawn, I will say that Mr. Fatherly has not been in the habit of drawing such petitions. It is the first time he has ever had occasion for one, and I think very likely it will be the last. I hope the Senate will pass the bill.

The bill was passed, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. INGALLS on the 26th of January:

Resolved, That the Senate will be ready to receive the House of Representatives in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday, February 9, at twelve o'clock meridian, for the purpose of being present at the opening and counting of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate to make a list of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, which shall be entered on the Journals, and if it shall appear that a choice hath been made agreeably to the Constitution, such entry on the Journals shall be deemed a sufficient declaration thereof.

The pending question being on the amendment reported by the Select Committee to take into consideration the state of the law respecting the ascertaining and declaration of the Result of the Election for President and Vice-President of the United States, to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

1. That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 9th of February, 1881, at twelve o'clock m., and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States; and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the Journal of the two Houses.

2. That if it shall appear that any votes of electors for President or Vice-President of the United States have been given on a day other than that fixed for casting such votes by act of Congress, in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States; if the counting or omitting to count such votes shall not essentially change the result of the election, they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of electors cast on the —— day of ——, 1880, to be counted, the result would be for A B for President of the United States —— votes and for C D for President of the United States —— votes; if not counted, the result would be for A B for President of the United States —— votes and for C D for President of the United States —— votes; but in either event —— is elected President of the United States. And in the same manner for Vice-President.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to insert after the word "resolved" and before the figure 1 in the amendment the words "by the Senate, the House of Representatives concurring." The substance of the resolution is a concurrent resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is necessary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and that modification will be made.

Mr. MORGAN. I also move to strike out the words "one person," where it reads "that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate," and to insert "two persons," and changing "a teller" to "tellers," so as to make it read "that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate;" so that the Houses shall be equally represented.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it is just one week from to-day until the Constitution and the law will require that the two Houses of Congress shall assemble at some place for the purpose of counting the vote of electors for President and Vice-President. In May last the Senate sent to the House of Representatives a rule upon this subject, which the House, so far as we are advised, has failed to take action upon. The time is drawing so short for the preparation which is necessary for this very important constitutional event that I suppose, in fact I know, that Senators on both sides of the Chamber consider that it is time that we should take some measures for the purpose of bringing the two Houses together, so that the votes of the electors may be counted.

The committee, I will say the majority of the committee, have concurred with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] who offered the resolution for which the committee offers a substitute, in the opinion that it is now necessary for us to go back to some of the old precedents of the fathers in order that we may get together in due form with as little of irritation and as little of debate as possible for the purpose of performing this important duty.

The Senate is aware of the fact, morally convinced of it, that some difficulty exists in reference to the electoral votes from at least one State; and while this matter has not been revealed to us, cannot be revealed to us in any authentic form till the opening of the certificates that have been sent to the Vice-President, still we know so well the existence of the fact that the State of Georgia did not cast her vote on the same day that the other States of the Union cast their votes, that it becomes an important matter that some step should be now taken to prevent controversy, when the two Houses have met together, over that vote. Fortunately for the country, that appears to be the only irregularity, the only difficulty, that is presented in respect of any of the votes of the electors from any of the States.

I think the country is to be congratulated that, after we have had so many difficulties in the past, we at last have an election where there appears to be but one question which can give rise to controversy or difference of opinion in the counting of the votes of electors. For my part, so far as I am advised, I am ready to admit upon all the facts that have been made public, upon that sort of history which is recognized by all men in this country, that Mr. Garfield and Mr. Arthur have been elected President and Vice-President of the United States; that the people of the United States in the respective States have chosen electors who have cast the electoral vote in such a way that they have received each of them a majority of all the votes for the offices for which they have been respectively chosen. I would not put the slightest embarrassment in the way of a peaceful, regular, and orderly count of that vote, and the transmission of our highest office from the hands of the gentleman who now holds it to the hands of his successor; and I believe that in the expression of this sentiment I shall receive the cordial accord on the part of Senators on both sides of this Chamber.

The question in reference to the State of Georgia is one of such serious importance, considered in reference to itself alone, considered in reference to the nature of the question, as that it might require properly long and careful deliberation for this body and the other House to come to a conclusion as to what was the true constitutional rule to be adopted. There are very grave differences of opinion on this question, because the question itself is one of great gravity and one of great importance. It seems to me impossible at this time, in the brief period which must intervene between this and the counting of the electoral votes, that we should arrive at a constitutional settlement of that question. Indeed the tribunal which is to make a constitutional determination of that question is itself a matter of serious disputation, and has been for a great number of years. The manner of arriving at a solution of it, whether by an independent expression in each House, or by a concurrent resolution, or by a joint resolution, or by a law, is also a matter of serious disputation, and has been for a great many years.

It was therefore thought better by the majority of the committee—and I dare say that in this also there is perhaps a concurrence even of the minority—that a precedent which had been acted upon in one form or another during three controversies of this kind should be adopted. It being certain, as we understand, that Mr. Garfield is elected President of the United States, without reference to the question whether the vote of Georgia is counted or not counted, it seems to be the duty of the two Houses now to arrive at, to ascertain, to declare, and to enforce the result in which the country will find its peace, and I hope and trust its satisfaction. We therefore have thought that it was not inappropriate, that it was not a transgression of the traditions of this country, that indeed it was the best thing to do under the circumstances, to adopt that rule which was adopted in 1837, and which is substantially adopted in this resolution, with the exception that the name of a State is not included in the resolution, but the fact that some State may have voted or perhaps has voted on a day not that fixed by laws of Congress and the Constitution of the United States is stated in the resolution, and the resolution is predicated upon the assumption that such a fact exists, and if it is found to exist, an order is arranged to be taken in that event by which that vote can be disposed of without producing any friction in the two Houses when they are assembled. I beg leave to say that in the case of the vote of Wisconsin, in 1857, when such preparation was not made, though the fact was known and should have been anticipated, the omission of this preparation to make provision for the event led to such things in the joint meeting of the two Houses, and afterward in each House, and to such disputation and such discontent on the part of members of the House of Representatives and the Senate as to the settlement of that question, and as to whether it was settled or not settled, as it would be desirable to avoid. In view of what then occurred, it seems to me it is the part of patriotism and prudence that we shall now take some steps for the purpose of anticipating and avoiding that danger.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I have listened with great pleasure to the observations of the Senator from Alabama, who has stated that a constitutional election, as we understand it, of a President and Vice-President of the United States has been achieved and that the persons elected are the persons whom he has named, so that all that is left is really a ceremonial, because the Constitution says that the votes being opened, shall be counted, and that the person who has the majority, being a majority of all the electors appointed, shall be the President of the United States. That makes the Constitution the same as if it had said, shall be the President of the United States, whatever anybody may say to the contrary, be that body the President of the Senate, the Senate, the House of Representatives or any two or all three of those bodies together. I think myself that is the Constitution, and that the Constitution never intended to leave it, and never has left it, by force of the Constitution alone, to any one or all of these three authorities to determine who has been elected by the States—and I emphasize that word as a State-rights man—to be the Chief Executive of the nation for the period mentioned in the Constitution.

I have no disposition to discuss or criticise the second part of the amendment recommended by the committee, in respect of, as it is understood, the State of Georgia, rejecting, as I do, and denouncing—not in the sense of personal hostility, but in its broader sense—all implications that any amount of casuistry might draw out of the way in which this amendment is stated, either in its first or in its second part as to an assumption of power on the part of anybody under the existing state of the law to decide in the sense of a finality, or in the sense of any legal effect, whether the vote of the State of Georgia ought to be counted or not.

So saying—and saying this I think for all Senators who agree with me in these general principles, and I believe everybody does—I am willing for one to acquiesce in this method of not disposing of or deciding upon the question, or rather in this method of not disposing or deciding upon any question whatever. In this state of certainty as we suppose, it is not necessary that we should go into the question of whether you as the President of the Senate, or whether the two Houses together or separately, or all three, can determine any question arising out of an event like this.

With this disclaimer and denunciation of the implications which as I said before casuistry might possibly raise out of the language of this amendment, I am willing to have the ceremony proceed; but I submit to the chairman of the committee and to the Senate that the words "Hall of the House of Representatives" ought to be stricken out, and the words "Senate Chamber" inserted in their place, and I make that motion.

I make it not because I suppose or suspect that there is the slightest practical consequence on this occasion in such a change; but precedent does make history and does make law in a certain sense, and the time may come (as it has on one occasion already come) when the carrying of these archives, the voice of thirty-eight sovereign States, an eighth of a mile through such a great crowd of people whom you do not know, in a time of high excitement, to the other end of this Capitol building, would be a matter of danger and exposure; and when you look to the theory of the Constitution—I am not talking about the mere legal propriety of going over to the House of Representatives; I do not for the present deny it or assert it; but I am talking about the wise thing and the wise spirit of the Constitution that says these votes shall be sent to the President of the Senate. They are sent to him as an officer. The person of the President of the Senate may change from day to day, as we all know, including the President pro tempore who is the President of the Senate for the time being. They are sent, therefore, to this body in the person of its presiding officer. I do not mean by that to say that the body has any control over them; but I use that phrase in order to show that they come to the head of this body in his official character.

The Constitution itself says that on the day appointed by law, he having in charge the sacred records shall open them in the presence of the two Houses that then the votes shall be counted, and so on. I submit, therefore, earnestly to my honored friend, the chairman of this committee, and to all other Senators, that the true and only wise place—I am not now talking about the mere technical law—for performing this great function is the place where the President of the Senate officially and rightfully always is.

The only argument that was ever suggested against that has been simply the argument of physical convenience; that as the Chambers of the Capitol used to be (after the earlier days when it was done here) the Hall of the House of Representatives being larger, it was physically more convenient to have it done there, and so it was for a great many years. But the Hall of the Senate is now large enough to leave no physical obstacle to the convenient dispatch of that business here; and therefore I claim and I urge upon Senators the propriety of causing this great act to be done in the place where on every theory and upon every principle of security and wise procedure it ought to be done. If at some future day there should arise a disturbance and a trouble, and the President of the Senate and the tellers appointed by the Senate, if there should be any, on such an occasion, moving this eighth of a mile into the other House, should be despoiled of these documents, it would be a very serious thing. If on some such occasion also it should happen that a disagreement, a disturbance, a tumult should arise in the Hall of the House of Representatives, as there has been—not a very serious one, but as there has been on the occasions of the counting of votes in a case like this where there was no doubt in any man's mind as to what the result was, producing a scene of tumult and confusion where nothing could be done except for the President of the Senate to say without taking the opinion of the Senate about it at all that the Senate would now withdraw and march out. That would be very inconvenient.

If any such scene should occur hereafter as I pray there never will, if anybody is to withdraw,—I am not now trying to impress anybody with my ideas about the power—let the withdrawal take place so as to leave the President of the Senate and these public documents in the place where they belong; do not require the person whom the Constitution says as such person, shall open these votes, to move an eighth of a mile or any other distance from his proper place in order that whatever may constitutionally be done on that occasion or succeeding it may go on.

I appeal to Senators, therefore, to vote for this amendment which I offer, to make this place, now when there is no question, the place for the opening and the counting of these votes. As I said before, the only argument that was ever made for another place, that of mere physical convenience, has no weight inasmuch as this Chamber is large enough for every member of the Senate and every member of the other House to be comfortably accommodated.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, for seventy-odd years, if my memory is not at fault, the votes of the electors of President and Vice-President have been counted in the Hall of the House of Representatives; and on no occasion has any Senator, either going to or returning from that Hall, been in any way molested or insulted. I am not for changing a practice sanctioned by such long usage, and especially am I not in favor of introducing a subject about which the two Houses may disagree, when on this day week, only seven days from this time, it will be our duty to attend the counting of these votes. I hope the motion of the Senator from Vermont will be voted down.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I am sorry to detain the Senate in the present position of its business by a discussion of this much discussed subject; but it seems to me to be my duty not to let this resolution pass without calling attention to what appears to me to be its character.

We have had, more than once, more than twice, in our history, to resort to a mere makeshift to get over the temporary difficulties caused by differences of opinion in regard to the proper method of discharging this constitutional duty. Probably on every one of those occasions there has been an expectation on the part of the members of both Houses of Congress and of the public that as soon as the presidential election was settled the wisdom and sense of duty of legislators would cause them immediately to address themselves to the removal from the country in the future of the great danger which grows out of a dispute over the method of ascertaining the title to executive power. And yet as soon as the present emergency has passed by the subject has passed from public attention, to come up again at the time of a close presidential election as a matter of danger, as a matter of alarm, and as a matter to be again encountered by some temporary shift like the one which is now proposed.

Now, sir, what is this resolution so far as it is agreed upon by the members of the committee who have reported it, as the Senate understands their opinion? It is a method of getting around the disputed question who shall count the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States by a provision for declaring the result without counting them at all. The one thing in regard to which the mandate of the Constitution is express and absolute that the votes shall then be counted is got over by the provision that the Senate and House of Representatives shall meet the President of the Senate, that the votes shall be opened, and shall not be counted at all. That is the whole substance of this resolution. There is to be no count of the presidential vote this year, as the Constitution expressly demands. How can you say that the votes are counted? What we are to do is exactly what the Senator from Alabama says he is ready to do, that being satisfied in advance of the official communication and in advance of any opportunity to examine the questions which may come up as to who is elected President and who is elected Vice-President, he is willing that we shall meet and go through some part of the constitutional process, shall declare that Mr. Garfield and Mr. Arthur are elected, and get rid of the question in that way. Have Mr. Garfield and Mr. Arthur a certain number of votes, ascertained by counting the votes without the State of Georgia, or have they eleven more votes, is a question which for all time no human being is ever to be able to answer. The votes are not to be counted at all. How is it counting a vote in any sense of that term to say that Mr. John Smith had either twenty votes or thirty-one, and nobody has inquired or ascertained or determined which?

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator is certainly aware that that is substantially the form that I might say has almost universally been adopted from the foundation of the Government. Certainly we have been for a great many years counting the votes under just such phraseology. Have the votes never been counted?

Mr. HOAR. The votes were not counted in the Wisconsin case.

Mr. THURMAN. We are not speaking about the second resolution. If I understand the Senator, he says the first resolution does not provide for counting the vote.

Mr. HOAR. I say that there is no count of the votes if both resolutions be executed; nothing more.

Mr. THURMAN. I understand the Senator's position is that if that second resolution were not there at all there would be no counting of the vote of Massachusetts or the vote of Ohio.

Mr. HOAR. My position is exactly this, Mr. President, if I may illustrate it by an anecdote: when an Irishman was asked how many pigs he had, he said he counted eleven, but one little pig ran about so much that he could not count him. That is precisely what this resolution proposes to do with the State of Georgia. The counting of the vote under the Constitution is ascertaining, first, the whole number of votes cast, and that is not ascertained by saying "we have looked at the bundles and there are either 150 or 161, we do not decide which;" next, the ascertaining whether any person has a number of votes equal to a majority of the electors appointed. There is first the ascertaining of the number of electors appointed, and that is not to be ascertained by this process at all; next, the ascertaining whether any person has a majority of the whole number of votes cast, being a majority of the electors appointed, and then the ascertaining of the names of the persons from whom under the Constitution the President and Vice-President must be selected, in case no person has such a majority.

Now, it certainly is not ascertaining that number to say, in the absence of any provision for determining how many votes come within either of these categories, "We have satisfied ourselves that without counting the votes, still Mr. Garfield has more than Mr. Hancock." Suppose, instead of the process provided in this resolution, you were instructed when you opened the votes, Mr. President, to place those which appeared to be for one of the candidates in one pile and those which appeared to be for the other candidate in another, and the Senate should say, "Seeing that there is a higher pile on the President's desk for one candidate than there is for the other we are willing to declare that one of the candidates and not the other is elected, without counting the piles at all."

The fallacy of this resolution is in treating the counting process as applicable to each vote, that you count a vote or a number of votes when you determine, not what that number is, but whether they are to be added or not to a pile that is to be counted. You do not count each vote; you count the entire aggregate of votes, and the word "count" can have and does have in popular and constitutional meaning no other signification whatever.

It may be that this make-shift, which this committee has reached, is the only one possible in the existing condition of things in the two Houses of Congress; but it is to go into history; and there is danger unless the character of it is perfectly and thoroughly understood that it is to go into history as a snare and a source of danger to the country at some time in the future. If the vote is counted when you have left undetermined the question whether the 11 votes of one State are or are not to be included in the number entitled to be considered when you make the count, this same thing would be equally true if you had left undetermined that question in regard to ten States or in regard to twenty States, and it might be claimed that you had counted the vote when you had included in your reckoning only the vote of a single State or half a dozen States.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. I agree with him that if electors were appointed in Georgia they are to be computed in determining whether any candidate has received a majority of all the electors appointed, which is necessary in order that there shall be a constitutional declaration of a man having been elected President; but does not this resolution, the second resolution, very clearly concede that this declaration can only be made in the event that the votes cast for James A. Garfield, and about which there is no dispute, are a majority of all the appointed electors?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly I answer the Senator's question in the affirmative.

Mr. McDONALD. If it is such a majority, if it is a majority of all the electors that may be by possibility appointed, how can it affect the result in this case to adopt this resolution in this form?

Mr. HOAR. It does not affect it at all. My proposition is, not that it affects the result in this case in the least, that the committee have resorted to a scheme (it being a disputed question who shall count the vote) by which to declare the result of the presidential election without any person counting the votes at all. It is just as if they had said in this second resolution, "having ascertained that James A. Garfield and Chester A. Arthur are elected President and Vice-President without counting the votes," it being true that if the votes are counted and if the votes are not counted precisely the same result follows, therefore, without directing the declaration of a constitutional election to be made, without any count at all, "they are declared elected."

Mr. President, I am very sorry to have detained the Senate, because I have certainly no desire, and no expectation if I had a desire, to resist the progress of this scheme of apparent compromise between the two opinions; but before this matter passed into history to become I am afraid another historic precedent, with very great danger that after the presidential election is settled and the new President inaugurated we shall do just what we have done in the past four years, I deemed it my duty to put on record my protest and my conviction that the Congress of the United States has got over the temporary danger and temporary difficulty, not in a constitutional way, by providing by law as it ought to have done at the time of the last election, a method of performing this constitutional function of counting the vote, but by refusing to perform the one clearest and most imperative duty which rests upon somebody, under the Constitution, to count the vote.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, this second resolution is first found in form, or at least in substance, in a resolution offered by Mr. Clay in the case of the State of Missouri. I think it is found again in substance in the case of the State of Michigan. It was again acted upon in the count of the votes in 1869, when according to the interpretation of the then President of the Senate Congress had decided that if the vote of Georgia would change the result it should not be counted, but if it would not change the result it should be counted—a very curious thing; but that was a misinterpretation of the then presiding officer. The effect really of the enactment of Congress in regard to Georgia was that the vote should not be counted.

Now, Mr. President, I would be perfectly willing, were there not some technical objections which weigh with Senators, that the Senate, and the other House, too, should express their opinion upon the only question that can arise, or is at all likely to arise, under this second resolution. I have no doubt whatever in my own mind that the votes of the State of Georgia can not be counted; but I ought to say that with some diffidence, because there are very good lawyers in this Senate who entertain quite a different opinion upon that subject. But I pass that by. This was the only way in which we could frame this resolution so as to obtain the consent of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. President, the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts is wholly defective. If he is right, it would follow as a matter of course that it is part of his duty to offer an amendment to this resolution which shall declare who shall count, that is to say, who shall count in the sense of deciding, because there are two things to be done; one is to decide, and the other is to count. Suppose it were admitted that the presiding officer of the Senate has the function of counting, limiting the word "count" to its plain and obvious meaning, and carrying it no further by implication, what would follow? That when it was decided by the proper authority whether a vote should be counted or not, and it was put down in the list, then it was the duty of the President to count the vote which was thus decided to be a legal vote. That would be all of it—a mere clerical duty, a mere performance of a sum in arithmetic. That is all.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator, if this resolution be executed, how many votes will Mr. Hancock have for President of the United States? Does he know or ever expect to know?

Mr. THURMAN. I shall know, and know perfectly well.

Mr. HOAR. Nobody will count it.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, I know it; and I know it just as well as I know how many votes General Grant had in 1868 or in 1872, how many votes Mr. Tilden had and how many Mr. Hayes had in 1876, or how many Mr. Jefferson, or Mr. Madison, or Mr. Monroe, or Mr. John Quincy Adams had; because under similar resolutions we have had count after count of presidential elections for more than half a century, if not for three-quarters of a century, and nobody ever doubted about those counts. When this resolution says each teller shall make a list of the votes as they are declared, and then the result shall be handed to the President of the Senate, who shall declare that result, and it shall be entered upon the Journals, I really think it is hypercriticism on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts to say there has been no count, and that the votes by which Madison and Monroe and Jefferson and Taylor and Polk and Van Buren and Jackson all were elected were never counted. Oh, Mr. President, that will not do.

There is, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, a difference of opinion as to who is to count in the sense of deciding; that is, who is to decide upon votes contested. There is perhaps an irreconcilable division now. I shall be perfectly willing and always have been that a law should be passed on this subject, but no law ever has been passed. I believe it to be within our competency to pass a law; but I cannot say in the absence of a law that every declaration of an election from that of General Washington down to this time has failed to perform the duties required by the Constitution, and that the votes, therefore, have not been counted and have not been properly counted. I cannot say that. To say that would be to stultify ourselves, as it seems to me.

But, Mr. President, I am talking too much. I ought not to have said thus much. I do think, however, that it is our duty to pass the resolution and send it to the other House, and let the House act upon it. The time is fast running away. At all events, if this matter is left without anything whatever to regulate it, it shall not be my fault and will not be the fault of my friends here.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, we are engaged in the consideration of a very grave subject, and I have no doubt that we all want to get at this matter in the fairest possible way. The twelfth article of amendments to the Constitution devolves a duty upon the President of the Senate to open the votes. The ballots of the electors are sent to him under an act of Congress, and of them he is made the custodian. The resolution reported by the Senator from Alabama, in the spirit of the Constitution and this act of Congress, makes the President of the Senate the presiding officer when the two bodies are in convention, and devolves upon him the further duty of declaring or announcing the result. So there is nothing in this resolution taking from the official duty, either under the law or the Constitution, of the President of the Senate, as would seem to be intimated by the Senator from Vermont in his amendment.

What I mean, in other words, is this: the resolution reported by the Senator from Alabama does not interfere at all with the duties and rights of the Vice-President or the President of the Senate, either under the Constitution or under the act of Congress; but, in harmony with the Constitution and with the act of Congress, it makes him the presiding officer of the convention of the two bodies and makes it his duty to declare the result. Now, the amendment of the Senator from Vermont would seem to carry with it the impression that something was being in this resolution detracted from the President of the Senate. Such is not the resolution as I read it. He is shorn of no power, of no authority by this resolution; on the contrary, if possible, more power, more duty is placed upon him by the operation of this resolution. The resolution in almost so many words is the same as the one adopted in 1837. We have progressed and counted under it regularly. In the absence of a law, the practice of the Government in any of its departments becomes a law in our country. There is no law on this subject, which is much to be deprecated, but here is a custom now running back to 1837, and practiced from that time continuously, which by force and by operation becomes, in the absence of any statute, a law binding on this country. We have practiced under it since then; the Government has lived under it; the Government has progressed under it; and we are proposing simply a repetition of that which has been peaceful and been effective for the purpose since 1837.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GARLAND. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Do I understand the Senator to say that this is a subject which ought to be regulated by law?

Mr. GARLAND. I do not mean law in the sense of statutory law as distinguished from the Constitution. I think I comprehend the scope of the question of the Senator from Florida, and I may concur with him that the regulation should be by the Constitution, instead of by law as distinguished from a constitutional provision. But now we have progressed under this mode of procedure; and as the Senator from Ohio inquired, what is the necessity for a change when the fact is presented to the country broadly that one man is elected President and about that there can be no dispute?

I do not see the difficulties suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. The Constitution says:

> The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed.

We know, as a matter of fact, and as a matter of law, that there are so many electors by right in the United States, and we know as a matter of law how many are a majority of those electors. When these packages are opened A B has 138 electoral votes beyond controversy; C D has 75, say; and here are 13 from a State that are in controversy. If you count them and put them to the one man or the other, they do not affect the result. Therefore we do not undertake to say by any general proposition how those votes shall be treated; and indeed, as suggested by the Senator from Florida, it may be very doubtful whether we have any authority to say as an abstract proposition that no vote shall be counted that was cast on a day different from that when the others were cast; but whether they be counted or not, the result is not affected. All tribunals, all courts pretermit questions when their decision is not absolutely necessary for the adjudication of the case in hand, and say "the case is decided on this point, and this other point which has been raised is not necessary for the decision and we pass it by." That is what this resolution says and what has been said in half a dozen resolutions of like character.

I am not so fortunate as the Senator from Ohio, when he says he has no doubt that the vote of Georgia ought not to be counted, anticipating a little, presuming now that we know exactly what the vote of Georgia rests upon and the facts that surround that vote. Take it for granted that it was simply cast by the electors on a day different from that named in the act of Congress; I am not as lucky as the Senator from Ohio in saying that I have no doubt about that question. I have very great and very serious doubt about it. In fact I never encountered a proposition upon which I had so much doubt as I have upon it, and until that question is presented to us broadly and a decision exacted upon it, I say we should pretermit it and pass it by as not being necessary to the adjudication of the cause. There is much to be said upon both sides of that question when you come to examine it, and I do not wish to be a party to establishing any mere abstract or theoretical rule which, if established, can bind nobody, that a State shall be disfranchised because her electors happen to cast their vote on a day different from that designated by the act of Congress, whether that casting was caused by negligence, by corruption, or by anything else.

Besides being a very doubtful question it is a very serious one, and I would ask Senators to pause and ponder before sending out any general conclusion on the matter. In America the question in relation to the result of an election is, What is the will of the people voting? If this can be fairly ascertained no irregularity or informality can stifle it; and in law that is certain which can be made certain. In view of this universal doctrine and in view of the fact that election laws in their apparent essentials have over and over again been held merely directory and not mandatory, and no right is lost by a party when he has done all he can on account of the malfeasance, misfeasance, or nonfeasance of a public officer, it is well for us to be slow in determining this question.

The resolution is sufficient to meet the case as it is presented. Heretofore such a resolution has been sufficient unto the day when the difficulty arose; so let this be sufficient for this occasion; and if any votes come within the category described not affecting the result, let it be declared that if they were cast for A the result is so; if they were cast for B the result is so, but in either event the result is not affected, and that leaves the question to be decided whenever it shall really present itself in a shape to require decision. It will be time enough then to decide it, and not before. As far as I am able to consider the subject I think this is the fairest and best solution we can get, and therefore I shall vote for the resolution reported by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, this discussion upon the general subject of the electoral count is interesting and valuable, but I respectfully submit that in view of the emergency that is now upon us it is perhaps somewhat unprofitable.

These subjects have been under discussion for the better part of a century, and no conclusion has been reached. It is obvious to all that the Constitution is defective in some particulars, and that it does not provide for conditions that have arisen which were not contemplated by the framers of that instrument. It is too late for us to remedy those defects now. We cannot pass any law that will meet them; neither can we agree upon any joint resolution that will commit both Houses to a principle that will be recognized as settling these disputed questions. The point before is, shall we adopt the resolutions reported by the committee? and I desire to say here that I feel exceedingly grateful to the committee for the action that they have taken and for the resolutions they have reported. They meet very nearly my views upon the subject; and I want to submit merely one or two observations upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, which I understand to be the practical question before the Senate, and that is whether we shall in our resolution invite the House to meet us in this Chamber or whether we shall announce to them that we will proceed to the Hall of the House.

There are three reasons why I think at this time the Senate ought to agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont; and in expressing those reasons I do not propose to say that I am not willing to meet the House in their own Hall, but there are reasons why I think that in adopting this resolution we should invite them to meet us in this Chamber.

The first is a mere question of etiquette. In this resolution, proceeding from the Senate, is it not appropriate that we should invite them to meet us here? Have we any abstract right to say that we will, without hearing from them on the subject, meet them in their Hall on the 9th of February at the hour of twelve o'clock?

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me, I will suggest to him that the resolution is concurrent, and until the House concur it is ineffective.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that, but it proceeds from the Senate, and if the House shall concur with an amendment, of course I shall be entirely willing to meet the House of Representatives in their Chamber. As this resolution proceeds from the Senate, I submit that it is appropriate that we should invite the House to meet us in this Hall, and if they see fit to amend it, in the absence of any stronger reason than I have yet heard, I shall be very glad to concur in that amendment.

There is, however, one other reason which has been suggested by the Senator from Vermont that appears to me to have some weight, and that is that there may emergencies arise in which it will be advisable that the Senate should retain the power of having these votes counted in its own Chamber and by the officer who is under the Constitution the custodian of the certificates. I was one of the tellers of the electoral count in 1877; Senators will recollect that dark and troublous period; and in connection with this subject I will mention an incident of secret history. During that month when this matter was pending we received information one morning that in the course of our progress from this Chamber through the Rotunda to the Hall of the House for the purpose of going into joint convention, there would be an attack made upon the Sergeant-at-Arms and the other officers having the certificates in charge and that they would be taken from us and destroyed. I dare say it was a mere rumor, as a Senator suggests. Very probably it was; but desperate occasions like that give rise to rumors. It is not necessary for me to state what precautions were taken, although no assault was made; but I mention that for the purpose of showing that emergencies may arise where it would be desirable that the certificates should not be exposed to the danger that the Senator from Vermont has depicted.

But there is a third reason why I think the amendment should be adopted, which is more important than all, and that is this: suppose the House take no action at all on this resolution; I do not assume that they will not act; but suppose that they do not; suppose we adopt this resolution and it goes to the House of Representatives and there reposes upon their table not acted upon at all, shall we not be left in a very unfortunate predicament if we have committed ourselves to the fact of meeting them in the Hall of the House of Representatives and thereby to a certain extent have deprived ourselves of the power of counting the vote in our own Chamber?

I say, then, upon these three practical considerations it appears to me that we should adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, and if the House concurs with an amendment asking that the meeting be there, we can agree to it; but if the House does not agree, if there is no action whatever taken by the House of Representatives, we still have the power here to proceed in this Chamber to the discharge of the great constitutional duty.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the questions which have been raised upon this resolution. The truth is that I feel but very little interest in it. It is conceded on all hands that there is no doubt about who have been elected President and Vice-President of the United States for the next four years, and I presume there is not a man in this Hall or the other, nor, as far as I know, a single man of the fifty millions of the American people, who has the slightest desire to interfere with that result or to obstruct in any way its legal declaration. I think, therefore, all this discussion as to the ways and means of arriving at a conclusion that everybody admits is not very profitable or very interesting to the Senate or the country. I am therefore willing myself, so far as I am concerned, to agree to almost any reasonable plan of ascertaining the result at this time. I think it is the imperative duty of Congress, before another such occasion shall arise after the lapse of four years, to make such provision as will avoid any possible doubt or trouble in the future.

I rise now simply to say one or two things in relation to the vote of my own State. I have seen it intimated, and more than intimated, in several quarters that the failure on the part of the electors of Georgia to cast their vote on the day fixed by the law of Congress arose from a disposition in that State to regard the law of the State on this subject as of higher authority than the law of Congress. I wish to say here that that is not true. There was no intention or idea on the part of anybody in Georgia, in authority or out of authority, to disregard the law of Congress on this subject or doubt that the law of Congress fixing the day for the vote by the electors was the supreme law. There has never been any law in Georgia in conflict with the law of Congress or intended to be in conflict with the law of Congress on that subject.

Without going into the particular history to explain how it happened (a fact which we all know but do not yet know officially) that the electors of Georgia did vote one week after the day fixed by the law of Congress, I simply say that there was simply a failure to know the fact that the first Wednesday in December, 1880, came before the first Monday in December. The failure to know that simple fact of the almanac caused the whole trouble, and there was no desire or intent on the part of anybody to hold that the State law was supreme over the Federal law on this subject, no desire to disregard the Federal law. Indeed, the whole intent was to comply with the law of Congress and vote on the day that the electors in all the other States voted. It was just one of those accidents that may happen anywhere or at any time.

So far as the legality of the vote of Georgia is concerned, I hope I shall be pardoned for saying one thing, and that is this: I concur fully and thoroughly with the view expressed by the Senator from Ohio, and I say, as he said, that to my mind there is no doubt upon this subject—none whatever. As he said, there are very good lawyers in the Senate, and one of them we have heard speak since the Senator from Ohio expressed his view, the excellent Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] who contend that there is doubt. We must of course admit that there must be doubt in reasonable minds on this subject when such a Senator says there is doubt in his mind; and therefore the question may take somewhat of a doubtful character; but for myself I have and can have but one opinion. I think it is very clearly the duty of Congress, the imperative duty of Congress under the Constitution, to fix the day on which the electors shall cast their votes for President, and it is the imperative duty to fix that day the same throughout the United States. There are admirable reasons, very cogent reasons, why that provision was incorporated in the Constitution. It would be a fatal mistake, in my judgment, to disregard those reasons. I think the convention was wise, very wise, in requiring that the electors should cast their votes on the same day throughout the United States, and it works very great mischief, in my judgment, to disregard that rule.

I deeply regret that my own State, by a simple accident, has cast her vote on a day different from that day fixed by the act of Congress. I rejoice exceedingly that this accident has happened when it can do no harm, when it cannot change the result. Much confidence as I have in the intelligence and patriotism of the American people and of the Representatives and Senators of the American States and people, I do rejoice that the temptation has not been presented to them of counting or not counting these votes when the counting or not counting of them might change the result. I greatly rejoice in that fact; but as it has occurred, to prevent all possible doubt in the future, to prevent the recurrence of such an accident in the future, I think it the duty of Congress to say emphatically and in language that cannot be mistaken that the votes of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States must be cast on the day prescribed by the law of Congress, and that that day must be the same throughout the United States. If the vote of one State can be cast on any day other than that fixed by the law of Congress, then each State may cast her vote on a different day from that of any other State, and thus every State may utterly and totally disregard the law of Congress and that provision of the Constitution which the law of Congress is intended to carry out. Then we should have the anomaly of the Constitution declaring that the day on which the votes of the electors shall be cast shall be the same throughout the United States, and yet each State voting on a different day from every other State and every State voting on a different day from that fixed by the law of Congress, which would make the Constitution a nullity.

These are my views on the matter. Coming as I do from the State which has made this mistake, I the more cheerfully express these views. Nobody intended to disregard the law of Congress in Georgia; nobody desired to disregard the law; nobody doubted its supremacy. It was simply an accident; fortunately an accident that worked no result; but for one I am willing to say that I cannot doubt that this provision of the Constitution is just as imperative, just as supreme, as any other provision of the Constitution, founded, not in accident, but in most excellent reasons. It was right that it should be so, and being so, we ought to respect it; and the States ought all to be notified that if they fail to cast their vote in the manner, and especially at the time, prescribed by the law of Congress, the vote will not be counted, and ought not to be counted, because if you can disregard the law of Congress in this respect you may disregard it in any other respect, and if the day on which the electors are to cast their votes can be different from that fixed by the law of Congress, then the day on which the people themselves may vote for electors may be different from that fixed by the law, and then we should have elections without law, which in my judgment would be nothing but anarchy.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I suppose that when the resolution was put in the shape that we find it, it was for the purpose of avoiding the agitation of this very delicate question. It must be obvious to the Senate that had it not been for a very serious difference of opinion in regard to this subject the resolution would not be in the condition that it is. I for one deprecate the discussion of this question at this time. There is no necessity for it, and in my judgment it would be much better to leave it open until a case arises which shall demand a clear expression of the will and opinion of the Senate on this angry and dangerous subject. Still I do not like to be here within the sound of the voice of the Senators who proclaim opinions on this question to make a record to go down and show that I sat in my seat and listened to certain opinions being promulgated and gave them acquiescence. For that reason I should have preferred that nothing had been said about it. I dissent totally from the opinion of the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Ohio on this question. I do not think that the framers of the Constitution ever contemplated an election for President of the United States to take place and the votes therein to be counted without the voice of each State in the Union being heard; and I for one will never consent to the proposition that because by mere accident, like an invasion, an epidemic, or any cause of that kind, the electors were prevented from meeting at the capital of the State on the day designated in the law of Congress, that is to deprive that State of her voice. Never! The act of Congress not only requires that they shall cast their vote on a given day, but it requires that they shall meet at a designated place, the capital of the State, and cast the vote. And now I ask the question if a public invasion had taken place, if a great epidemic was there which endangered the lives of the electors so that they could not visit the capital, would any man say that because of that overwhelming necessity those votes could not be cast elsewhere?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Is the place of voting a constitutional requisition?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Neither is the other.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Is not the time of voting a constitutional requisition?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Time and place, I admit, in many instances, are substantial elements of an election. I do not think the language of the Constitution is mandatory. I think there is great force in the suggestion made by a Senator within my gaze now that that word "may" is not to be interpreted as meaning "shall."

Mr. EDMUNDS. It says "shall;" "which day shall be the same," &c.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Congress may prescribe a day, says the Constitution, and if it undertakes to prescribe it, it goes on to say that that day shall be the same throughout the Union. There is no objection to that. I assume the correctness of that principle, and the Constitution would be a very poor instrument if that provision had not been made in that way. But still I say that occasions may arise when that principle will not be violated and the vote cast on a different day.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. May I ask the Senator a question? Suppose I concede, for the sake of the argument—which I certainly do not concede—that the word "may" in the connection in which it occurs in the Constitution is directory and not mandatory; suppose I concede that Congress may prescribe the day, that confers upon Congress the power to do it, the Senator will admit. Congress exercises that power; Congress does fix the time, and Congress, in pursuance of the latter clause of that paragraph, says the time shall be the same throughout the United States, and fixes the time. Now, if Congress has the power to fix the day, and Congress has fixed it, is not that law made in pursuance of the Constitution the supreme law of the land, and can there be anything against it?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If the Constitution, which invests Congress with power over that subject, is only directory, then a law which follows it and which is made in pursuance of it must partake of the character of the organic provision.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Do I understand the Senator to say, conceding the power to be directory, for the argument's sake, which I do not concede, that where the power has been executed by the passage of a law, that law, because it is in pursuance of a directory and not a mandatory power, is less supreme than would be a law passed in pursuance of a mandatory power? Is not each law of Congress in pursuance of the Constitution equally the supreme law?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I admit the supremacy of the law; but that does not change the nature of the argument. A law may be supreme and yet be directory; a law may be supreme and yet be mandatory. You may take the electoral laws of nearly every State in the Union, and in one-half the provisions regulating the subject of elections would be held by any court in a case which involved the expressions of the people to be directory. A law is no less supreme because it is directory; but the Constitution says that Congress may prescribe the day, and if it undertakes to exercise that power it shall make it uniform throughout the Union. Now, I say that cases may arise under that law where the States may come forward and contend that some inevitable accident, public invasion, disease, or other great cause over which no human authority could have control, prevented this from being carried out; and in such a case the will of the people ought to be given effect. That is a proper case for making an exception; and the vote of the State ought to be counted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senate will come to a vote on this question. The very question which has been for the last half hour under discussion is now pending in the Judiciary Committee, and we shall probably have a report from that committee when Senators will have an opportunity of expressing their views more to their satisfaction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senate will come to a vote presently; that is, when every Senator has had the opportunity that he desires to say what he thinks he ought to say, and I hope we shall stick to this matter until it is finished.

I do not wish to go into the question of the validity or invalidity of the vote of Georgia, because I agree with the committee that it is a question that can be passed over without undertaking to decide it. It is, of course, perfectly clear under the Constitution that nothing but legal votes, constitutional votes, can be counted rightfully; and that refers us, in a case like this, to the question, what is a vote constitutionally considered? This resolution proposes to say that the question of whether this act of the State of Georgia is a constitutional act in the election of a President and one which is entitled to force in determining the result, need not be passed upon, without going into the question now whether anybody has power to pass upon it without law, or not—that it need not be passed upon in the event that it is of no practical consequence whether it is a legal vote or is not. This concurrent resolution, therefore, simply says that the papers coming from the State of Georgia may be made manifest, and those papers will show undoubtedly, for the act of Congress provides for showing, who are the electors that the State of Georgia lawfully appointed as electors. Therefore they make up a part of "the whole number of electors appointed," and any person to be elected President of the United States must have a majority of that whole number. How much is a majority is of no constitutional consequence. Now, then, all this says is that if it appears that one candidate or another has a majority of all the electors appointed, without regard to deciding the question whether the act of Georgia is a lawful vote or not, it shall be so declared hypothetically; in other words saying, the state of the papers is so and so; nobody undertakes to decide whether this vote is a constitutional vote or not; and it is of no practical consequence.

Now I want to say in reply to my friend from Florida just a word on the topic itself, although I have made a disclaimer about that, and then I shall be done after one other observation. There is great force in what he says; but I submit to him one test of the strength of his argument as applied and illustrated by the time of choosing the electors as distinguished from the day of their giving their votes. This is the language of the Constitution:

> The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

I submit to him whether it is not clear from that language that while Congress may determine the time for choosing electors and the day for giving their votes, the command that the day shall be the same throughout the United States refers to the word "day" mentioned in the last preceding clause, and does not necessarily refer to the word "time" for the choice of electors.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think that the spirit of the Constitution would require that the election for the electors should be held on the same day, and I think that has been the interpretation given by Congress to it, because the very objection that has been open to electors voting on different days under the practical operation of the Constitution would be open to holding the elections on different days. It is well known that when the Constitution was adopted it was expected, as I had occasion to say on a former occasion in the Senate, that the electors would exercise an independent choice outside of the people; but really and practically the presidential election is now determined on the day on which the electors are chosen, and not on the day that they cast their votes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What my friend from Florida says is a very strong argument to show that both these provisions are matters of inherent and deep substance, because he has argued to show why the word "time" ought to be taken in the spirit of the Constitution as included within the last clause of this sentence, that it should be the same throughout the United States, and there is very great force in it, but I submit to his consideration—and I do not mean to commit myself about that now, only to compare suggestions—I submit to his consideration whether his very argument, which is quite forcible, does not show that both the provisions were thought to be of fundamental and substantial importance in respect of security against corruption and tumult.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it be, therefore, in the Constitution a matter of real substance for the great reasons which have been suggested, how can we say that it is directory? But let us look at it in another point of view.

"Congress may determine the time for choosing electors." That may or may not fall within the last clause which requires it to be the same throughout the United States; I do not say whether I think it does or not; but suppose that Congress should have determined the time, as it has, to be one day, the Tuesday after the first Monday in November throughout the United States; can it be contended—I am putting it merely as a question to be thought of,—that an election called and held in the State of Vermont on the second Tuesday after the first Monday of November, or on the second Tuesday before the first Monday of November, or on the first Tuesday of September, (which is the day for our constitutional State election, and when it would be immensely convenient to our people to elect their electors,) would be a valid election? And can you make it valid if it is required to be done on that day, on the ground that some overruling necessity prevented it? That is a very serious question which I commend to the consideration of Senators. The principle of it enters into all elections; but I pass that, because, as it appears to me, it is not indispensable that we should come to a solution of that question, and I come back to the amendment that I have offered, and that is, as Senators may have forgotten, to provide in this proposal to the House of Representatives for the assembling of the two Houses here.

My friend from Ohio has said that we have had seventy years of a different practice. I do not know precisely how many years, but I dare say it may have been something like that. Now I have here the record of the first occasion, I believe, when the presiding officer of the Senate departed from his seat and with the Senate proceeded to the Hall of the other House, in 1821. The joint committee of the two Houses who had been appointed to arrange for the ceremony—for it was then nothing but a ceremony—reported in favor of a meeting in the House of Representatives:

Mr. Barbour explained, in detail, the reasons which influenced the committee in adopting the resolutions which it recommended—which were the ordinary ones, for a meeting in the House of Representatives Hall and providing the hypothetical arrangement about the vote of the State of Missouri, just as in 1837 was done as to Michigan, and in 1869 as to Georgia, and as is proposed on this occasion for the State of Georgia.

Mr. King, of New York—

Who everybody will remember historically as one of the most conservative and wise and upright men—

Mr. King, of New York, spoke in particular reference to what he deemed the correct course of proceeding in joint meetings; thinking it consistent with the Constitution, and with propriety, that the House should come to the Senate if the apartment had not rendered it inconvenient; and that when a convenient plan should be completed for joint meetings, he hoped the practice heretofore prevailing would not be considered in the light of a precedent, but that they should repair thither, and the President of the Senate preside in joint meeting, &c.

That was the first occasion when the Senate departed from its place and its presiding officer from his, to go to some other place and to carry these great records of the Government with him, for a greater or less distance; and it might be from here to Georgetown in case this Capitol should be burnt down, or wherever you could find a convenient building, and there go through with the ceremony. I submit that a practice arising in that way, merely from physical and personal convenience of apartments, is nothing that ought to overrule what Mr. King said and what I think is the correct method and the safe method and in every respect the best and the truest method for doing this great duty. This Hall is large enough for every member of the House of Representatives and every Senator and the officers of the two Houses to perform this duty without discomfort and without inconvenience.

I hope, therefore, that we shall return to the true and best means for all times (because it is of no practical consequence to-day) of doing this thing, and that is here. It may be that four years hence when this body may be politically exactly what it is now and the House of Representatives may be politically entirely different from what it is now, and I suppose it will, and when there may have been a close election, there may be danger of tumult and disorder, and I submit that it is the wise thing to provide that where the records lawfully and constitutionally are of these acts of States, the two Houses shall assemble to perform that duty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EATON, (when his name was called.) In the absence of the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] on various matters, I agreed to pair with him where we should differ. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] If he were present, I would vote yea, and I presume he would vote nay.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BALDWIN. On this question and all political questions my colleague [Mr. FERRY] is paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.] Were my colleague present, he would vote yea, and I presume the Senator from Texas would vote nay.

Mr. BAILEY. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK.] If he were here, I should vote nay.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE] left the Chamber a few moments ago, and requested me to say on any vote that he and his colleague [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania] were paired. If he were here, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] would vote nay.

Mr. ALLISON, (after having voted in the affirmative.) As all of one party seem to be voting on one side and all of the other party on the other, I withdraw my vote, being paired on all political questions with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE,] who was obliged to leave the Chamber this morning.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 36; as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama who reported this resolution that the second paragraph contains what purports to be a formula that shall be used by the President of the Senate in declaring the vote. The last clause is, "And in the same manner for Vice-President." I would suggest to him, without formally offering an amendment, unless he desires, that the formula be perfected by declaring the form of language to be employed in regard to the Vice-President also, as the resolution must go to the House and this formula must be adopted by the two Houses when they assemble for the purpose of counting the vote.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the exact purpose which is intended to be accomplished. The resolutions which have preceded this have always contained the precise language that I have used here, and it has been considered a sufficient instruction to the President of the Senate to use the words "And in the same manner for Vice-President."

Mr. INGALLS. The language appears to me to be somewhat imperfect, but unless the Senator desires it I will not offer an amendment. I had prepared one that incorporated the form of language to be employed with regard to the Vice-President as well as the President, but if the Senator thinks it is not advisable I shall not offer it.

Mr. MORGAN. I think it is better to let it stay as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the committee to the original resolution.

Mr. EATON. Does this cover the whole original resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It covers the resolution reported from the committee to strike out and insert.

Mr. EATON. If it covers the whole resolution I have a word to say on this point. I do not intend to discuss the question at any length, but I have a word to say. I cannot support a resolution upon this subject which leaves one very important question in doubt, and that is the question whether the President of the Senate has the right to count the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. There was a resolution of this sort which I supposed would be brought up yesterday:

[June 15, 1880.—Ordered to be printed.]

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President of the Senate is not invested by the Constitution of the United States with the right to count the votes of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States so as to determine what votes shall be received and counted or what votes shall be rejected.

I had supposed that that resolution would have been called from the table yesterday and acted upon, and if that resolution had been called up and acted upon affirmatively, I should cheerfully give my vote for the other resolution of the committee, because I should have considered the action of the Senate upon that resolution a determination of their meaning of the resolution which is now before the Senate. But that has not been called up, it has not been acted on. The pending resolution reads in this way:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 9th of February, 1881, at twelve o'clock m., and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared.

What does that mean? The honorable Senator from Alabama says that the word "declared" there is simply the declaration of a clerical fact; another Senator says that the word "declared" there means that A B, C D, and E F are elected or appointed as electors for President and Vice-President. I cannot vote for a resolution that leaves any doubt upon the subject, and therefore at the proper time—and if this be the proper time in the opinion of the Chair I shall offer an amendment now, in the words of the Constitution of the United States. I move to strike out the words "as they shall be declared," and to insert in lieu thereof "as the certificates shall be opened by the President of the Senate." Those are the words of the Constitution, about which there can be no mistake, about which there can be no two opinions. That is the duty of the President of the Senate; and when he has executed that duty then the officers who have been appointed by the Senate and the House will count the votes and hand up their list to the President of the Senate, and he will make the necessary declaration.

I cannot vote for any resolution that leaves any doubt upon that great and important point. It is of no importance, I agree, so far as this election is concerned. Everybody concedes the election of General Garfield and General Arthur. Everybody concedes that they will on Wednesday, the 9th day of February, in some way be declared to be the choice of the people. I regret it, but it is so. But I cannot vote that the President of the Senate shall declare that fact, for it is not his duty.

Therefore I ask that this amendment shall be made. It is in conformity with the Constitution; and in my judgment it is no answer to the reason, poor though it may be, which I have given, to say that for one, or two, or three, or ten countings of votes this language has been used. My opinion is that a very great majority of the Senate are opposed to construing the Constitution in a way which gives the Presiding Officer that power. Very able and exhaustive arguments were made four years ago upon that identical subject; and I should like to have a vote of the Senate upon this point.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendment be reported before the debate goes on. I should like to hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the amendment of the committee, it is proposed to strike out the words "as they shall be declared" and to insert "as the certificates shall be opened by the President of the Senate;" so as to read:

That two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to make a list of the votes as the certificates shall be opened by the President of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, if I had been drafting a resolution for the first time for a count of the presidential votes three-quarters of a century ago, I should not have inserted the words "as they shall be declared," which the Senator from Connecticut moves to strike out; but they have been in resolution after resolution for a long time, I think certainly for more than half a century, and they never have been interpreted at any time as conveying by implication the idea that the President of the Senate had the right to count the votes in the sense of deciding what was a legal vote or what was not, or for whom the vote was cast or for whom it was not. I am not at all afraid that this resolution will convey any such implication. On the contrary, under resolutions of this kind, again and again votes have been received and votes have been rejected by the action of the two Houses of Congress, and not by the decision of the President of the Senate.

In view, then, of this history of the country, it seems to me to be, with great respect to my friend from Connecticut, an unfounded fear that there can be any implication from the use of these words that the President of the Senate has, not the mere power of counting, but the judicial power of determining whether the votes are valid or invalid, or for whom they are cast or for whom they are not cast. Therefore, I think our committee felt it best to follow the old usages, to which there can be no serious objection, and to which there is likely to be no serious objection in either House of Congress, and thus the resolution might pass.

But if I thought differently from that, I should not vote for the amendment of my friend from Connecticut, if he means that making the list by the tellers is to be considered any decision whatever. The language of his amendment is that they shall make a list of the votes "as the certificates shall be opened by the President of the Senate." But suppose there should be two returns, it would be the obvious duty of the President of the Senate to open them both. We have had that again and again. We had it at the last election. I have heard it said that somebody has got up a bogus return from Oregon now. Yes; the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] nods his head. Some man there gathered together two other able-bodied men, and they constituted themselves an electoral college and voted—I do not know for whom—for Weaver, I believe, or somebody else for President of the United States, and for somebody for Vice-President; it may be that they voted for Hancock for President.

Mr. SLATER. They divided their votes among the candidates.

Mr. THURMAN. They gave one vote for Hancock, and it may be one for Garfield, and one for Weaver; they divided them around fair and square. It may be that that is ridiculous, but still it will not do for the President of the Senate, if the thing comes up to him in the regular time and in a regular way, by people claiming to be electors of President and Vice-President, to say, "This is absurd; this is a hoax." It will not do; they have to be opened. Every law that we have ever passed upon the subject requires them all to be opened. Now the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut is that the tellers make out a list of the votes as the certificates are opened.

I do not think that practically there is any trouble in the world about the declaring of the vote. How is it? Let us look at it now in a practical sense and in an historical sense too. The President of the Senate opens a certificate; he hands it to the tellers, because there never has been a count without tellers. It is read by the tellers. No objection whatever is made to that vote, to its reception, to its being counted. It is put down in the list. There being no objection whatsoever, that vote being recorded in the list is a declaration sufficient that that is the vote of the State; and so it goes on: and just so long as no objection whatever is made to a vote, just so long do the members of Congress of both Houses present assent that that is the vote, and just so long does the President of the Senate, if he is the judicial power to decide, assent that that is the vote. That vote is sufficiently declared. It is only when an objection takes place that the question arises who is to decide upon the objection. I am not afraid to trust that both to the Constitution and to the uniform history, because never, in no single instance, has the President of the Senate decided such a question. Never has he; and in my judgment he never will. No, he will not; even if parties change, I do not believe that any President of the Senate will ever have the audacity to attempt what no man in the whole history of the Government from 1789 down to this day has ever dared to do. But, at all events, that is not the question now.

It has been truly said by Senators on this floor, and we know it is so, that we are tiding over the present case; that is, we do not decide it. We do not decide really who under the Constitution has the judicial power. Are we to blame for that? Our forefathers, eighty years ago, tried to decide it, and they could not. John Marshall drew a bill, when he was a member of the House of Representatives, and it passed that House, I think, but the Senate did not agree to it. The greatest minds in this country have tried it, and it is no disgrace to us that we have not been able to agree upon a measure when John Marshall and his associates in his day were unable to pass a bill. Mr. Van Buren tried it, when he was a member of the Senate, and failed. I hoped that it might happen in my time, not that I might do much about it, but that I might have the satisfaction of voting for it, and that we might agree upon some proper law on the subject. I hope yet it may happen that such a law may be perfected by those who are to come after me, and that, too, before another presidential election shall occur. But "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Your committee have reported a resolution that every man in this body and every man in the House can fairly vote for, as our forefathers voted for similar resolutions for more than half a century, and under which we have got along quietly in the count of the presidential votes.

Although I agree with my friend from Connecticut that if I were framing this resolution for the first time I would leave these words out, I hope the amendment will not be adopted, but that the resolution as reported by the committee will be agreed to, and that without any further modification.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate by any discussion of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, but I wish to submit an observation on what the Senator from Ohio has said about the impossibility of getting a law on this subject. He says that seventy or eighty years ago John Marshall tried to correct a trouble then existing and failed; that there is in some way an inherited disability upon the Congress and people of the United States to escape in any way from the danger which we now quadrennially encounter.

Mr. THURMAN. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. BLAINE. I understood the Senator to say that as John Marshall had failed in doing it, and Martin Van Buren had failed in doing it, it seemed to be something we ought not to take any reproach to ourselves for not doing.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I said that what they failed to accomplish it was no disgrace to us that we cannot. I did not say, however, that it would not be accomplished.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know of any disgrace that was said to attach to it.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator from Maine should remain in the Senate—and I am sorry he is going out of it—I have no doubt he would accomplish it before another presidential election.

Mr. BLAINE. I believe he would if he could get the votes of the Senators to go with him. I believe that any good, square, sensible man, and I do not profess to be anything else, could correct this if you could get the two parties to forego partisan advantage. But the trouble is that the moment the democratic party got into possession of both branches of Congress at the middle period of the last four years, they did not want to touch the question. I do not in this debate attribute to the democratic party anything more than I would attribute to any other party; but it somehow has fallen out in the history and development of this country that whereas the founders of the Constitution intended that Congress should have nothing whatever to do with controlling the election of President and Vice-President they now have everything to do with it, and it has now fallen out that when a party, whether it be the republican or the democratic party, controls both branches of Congress and decide on a question of doubtful electoral votes they are apt to decide for their own candidate.

Mr. McDONALD. On their own side?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, whether it is a democratic or a republican Congress. In my judgment if the elections of 1878 had given a republican House of Representatives and we had had a democratic Senate we would have secured a law on this subject. If that is any reproach to either party it is equally divided, and I am perfectly impartial in the distribution of blame.

If we are to believe the earnest speeches made here in 1876, we were then right on the crater of the volcano, right where the yawning gulf of chaos and dissolution confronted us, and we escaped it by a make-shift, and a pretty rickety one it was. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] bows assent to that statement. He and I walked out of this Chamber together on that pleasant winter morning when the bill for the electoral commission passed, having both voted against it. Whether it was an evil or a good, it is not worth while now to discuss. If an evil, we are in the negative on that vote, on the right side of the record. No matter, it was a make-shift; it was purely and entirely a make-shift. It settled nothing and unsettled everything, and in the most important crisis that can confront any people or any government—the law of succession—the people of the United States are to-day without law. There is no rule by which this system is settled. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee tells us it looks to him like an impossibility that we can get a law on this subject.

I do not know what may possibly be the political complexion of Congress for the next four years. We are going to start out with a republican House, but if anybody can tell me what the Senate will be after the 4th of March he is a wiser man than I am. However, I hope there will be at least that sort of divided power which will not give the assurance to either political party that they will have the undisputed sway in 1884, or in any subsequent year, over the electoral votes, and that the patriotism of both parties will come to see that taxation and tariff and funding bill and public debt are all of a subordinate character compared with this great question, which may involve a civil revolution at any moment. Fortunately the present election was conclusively settled in the electoral college, but I ask, without intending the slightest offense, what chance would General Garfield have to be inaugurated on the 4th of March if there was a doubtful electoral vote that came up here, which counted one way would elect Hancock and counted the other way would elect Garfield?

Mr. FARLEY. Has the Senator come to that conclusion from the action of the republicans in 1876?

Mr. BLAINE. I have come to that conclusion from things I have seen here and from the common frailties and common instincts of human nature. I have come to the conclusion that if this were a republican Congress they would decide for their candidate, and being a democratic Congress they would decide for their candidate. I am imputing nothing to the democratic party that I do not also impute to the republican party. I will not impute anything to either of them not inherent in the weakness of human nature. With that crisis staring us in the face, quadrennially returning here, and with that wonderful inclination or destiny which divides people about half and half on any given issue, the question remains undetermined. You can assemble the people by blowing a horn on the east front of the Capitol and state any issue to them and ten to one they will divide about equally upon it. Of the thirty-eight States in this Union nineteen voted for Hancock and nineteen for Garfield. The nineteen for Garfield had a few more electoral votes than the nineteen for Hancock.

Mr. EATON. And the other nineteen had a few more thousand votes.

Mr. BLAINE. Upon that subject I will not enter. The popular vote, I believe, as shown on the record, after depriving three or four hundred thousand American citizens of their dear right of suffrage gave three or four thousand popular majority for Hancock. Another count gives three or four thousand for Garfield; but I am not bringing that into discussion. The popular vote was very nearly equally divided; and to-day whether there be nine or ten million voters in this country, speaking in rough and equal phrase, they are about one-half democratic and one-half republican, as the States are about the same, and they will in all probability remain about the same. This even division seems to be the natural outgrowth of republican institutions based on free discussion and seems as clearly predestined almost as that the world should be peopled one-half of one sex and one-half of the other. It so comes; and we are not escaping this contingency except for four years. No man knows what four years or one year may bring forth in the tides of political fortune.

Therefore, I say it is the first duty of common patriotism that both parties should devote themselves to a constitutional, comprehensive remedy and not have us present the spectacle every four years of going through some extraordinary contrivance by which we shall prevent anarchy from ingulfing the country. I think the severest strain to to which this country was ever subjected outside the war of the rebellion was the incidents connected with the settlement of the Presidency in 1876, and I doubt whether if the term had been for a period of ten years this country could have found an entirely peaceful solution. I say that for the benefit of the gentlemen who think we ought to have a longer presidential term. If that had been for a ten years' settlement of the Presidency I do not believe we could have had as peaceful an adjustment as we happily reached. We got the advantage of a short term of four years, giving a period in the near future in which the case might be tried over again before the high court of the people. The shorter the term the more content the people are to submit. That is why the States that have had annual elections have had the most peaceful administrations in this country, and why they have had the most peaceful political contests. I believe the honorable Senator from Connecticut and myself will both live to see with regret that the New England States are giving up their old system of annual elections, and resorting to the biennial period. I believe the annual election of governor and Legislature in these States has conduced very largely to the peacefulness and harmony and success of their administrations as well as to the general readiness and heartiness of submission to the result by the defeated party. If beaten this year, in only twelve months you can try it again, and with one or two notable exceptions there has been very little excitement or disorder consequent upon the result.

I am very sure at all events that there has been less of unhealthy and dangerous excitement in States that have had annual elections than in any other States in the Union, and I believe that just in proportion as you elongate and lengthen the term of service of the President of the United States, just in the same proportion will there be extraordinary agitation attendant upon it. If it were a two years' term, elected as the House of Representatives is, bearing the imprint, as the Executive ought, of the popular branch of Congress, there would be less excitement than there is now. Make the term six, eight, or ten years, and you increase the excitement exactly in the same ratio. Now we have a four years' term. It is not likely to be changed, certainly not within the lifetime of this generation; but four years to men who have reached forty and fifty and sixty years comes around very rapidly; it comes around rapidly to all. It will be here very soon again, and it will be a reproach to that side of the Chamber and to this, to the Senator from Ohio and to myself, and to all of us, if there be not something done to relieve the country from the apprehension of what occurred in 1876, and what may occur again if no wise forecast be taken to prevent it.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the committee were anxious to avoid any unnecessary question of controversy at this late hour before the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President. Hence we went back to the form of resolution which has obtained since this Government was first established. I will read the resolution adopted on the 11th of February, 1793:

> That the two Houses shall assemble in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock; that one person shall be appointed a teller, on the part of the Senate, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid; which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

That language "as they shall be declared" has been incorporated in every resolution under which a presidential count has taken place down to the adoption of the famous twenty-second joint rule without any departure whatsoever; and as the Senator from Ohio has very well remarked, no one heretofore seems to have been apprehensive that these words in this resolution either conferred on the President of the Senate any peculiar power to count or denied to him any power to count. It was a mere method of procedure without a declaration of the opinion of the Houses upon the question at all.

The committee have undertaken to arrange a programme or an order of business, and they have not gone beyond that duty. They might very well have incorporated into this resolution a number of incidental questions which by possibility may arise on Wednesday next; but feeling that the time was too short to engage in a discussion of that kind, and knowing that both Houses of Congress had consumed a large amount of time in the debate of various propositions which have been brought forward in different forms, both of legislation and of joint rules, the committee thought that it was its duty at this time to confine itself to the arrangement of a method or programme of business, a mere order of procedure; and they have gone back to the first resolution that was ever adopted and have taken the very words from that resolution which are found in this, and which the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] now moves to strike out. I have such profound respect for his judgment, and also for his patriotism and for his sincere regard for the discharge of his constitutional duties as a Senator, that whenever that honorable Senator presents a question to my consideration I stop to think whether or not my preconceived opinions may not be in error; but on this proposition I think that the committee are not in error. I think the honorable Senator will not accomplish what he desires to do by striking out this language in the resolution and inserting what he proposes to insert.

I had the honor to lay before the Senate the resolution to which the Senator from Connecticut referred, in regard to the powers and a definition of the powers of the President of the Senate in counting the votes of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States; and I assure that honorable Senator that at a proper time I expect to ask the Senate to take that resolution up and pass it; but, whether the Senate shall pass it or whether it shall refuse to pass it, we shall still, if we adopt the resolution that the committee now offer, have a mode of procedure by which this great constitutional duty can be performed. I think that there is no difficulty in the situation; at least none that will be met by the amendment that the honorable Senator from Connecticut now submits.

As to the duty of the Senate and House of Representatives to have proceeded heretofore to have made some definite declaration of law on this subject, I concur fully with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] Perhaps he and I might differ about the method of arriving at that result, whether by a joint rule of the two Houses or by legislation, but if we had any difference at all it would be a difference that would base itself on our different opinions in respect of our authority under the Constitution of the United States.

But the complaint, although it may be wise and proper in reference to the conduct of the two Houses heretofore, is not one that has any bearing at this moment of time except to disturb our counsels and to prevent us from arriving at an agreement between the two Houses under which this important constitutional duty shall be performed. The Senator from Maine has no real right to complain of any one more than himself on this subject. He and I have been in the Senate together ever since I came here, and I have not yet heard that the honorable Senator had brought forward a proposition of law, a constitutional amendment, a joint rule, a concurrent resolution, or anything of the sort for the purpose of regulating this great subject. In last May, when the Senate had under discussion the joint rule which I had the honor to report from a committee, and a substitute was offered by the honorable Senator from Vermont, whereby he proposed to substitute a law for that joint rule, the law being in all essential particularities the same with the joint rule, I did not hear the honorable Senator from Maine rise and urge either proposition or deliver before the country the remarks which he has favored us with this morning in reference to the duty of the two Houses. There are Senators here who have been urging this question day in and day out from the time I have been here. The honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has devoted an immense amount of labor to this very question, and no opportunity has been allowed to escape him for urging before the Senate the duty of arriving at some conclusion which would settle all of these grave disputed and unsettled questions between the Houses; but it is now too late. We may lay the fault upon the one party or the other, upon one man or upon another, but how shall our faults of the past excuse us from our present duty of coming to an agreement as to the order of business under which we can perform this important function?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to say to my friend from Connecticut that I agree thoroughly with the views expressed by him, and I think a very large majority of the Senate fully concur with him; but I submit to my friend whether it would be better to urge that now—whether, indeed, it would not make the views which he and I both entertain appear weaker than they are, because we discover from the course of this debate that quite a number of gentlemen who concur in the opinion he expresses will not vote for his amendment, whereby a record may be made which may make it appear that his amendment is weaker than it is. I say to my friend that we are not engaged now in building a permanent structure over this terrible stream; we are crossing on a ponton; we are fixing a ponton to cross over because we have got to cross right away, and we think a ponton will carry us over because the waters are very quiet. When we are over this time, then we propose to put up a permanent and a stable structure, and of course I for one will be in favor of doing so, incorporating the idea very clearly suggested by my friend from Connecticut; but in the mean time I do not want the idea weakened by what may appear on the recorded vote.

I will announce one other thing which may seem a little extraordinary, and that is that I have very great pleasure in agreeing with almost everything said this morning by the Senator from Maine, and I think it is a good augury for the future that we do so thoroughly agree. It may be that the lion and the lamb are going to lie down together; of course the Senator from Maine being the lion. If so, we shall pass over all these future troubles without any difficulty; the country will be safe; there is no doubt about that.

I will say one thing that is corroboratory of what the Senator from Maine said, as to the duty of both parties to provide by stable and fixed and well-considered legislation against the recurrence of the dangerous troubles to which he alluded and which we all felt and saw. I think that both parties are somewhat to blame that this has not been done. My excellent friend from Alabama says that much has been done or intended to be done by the Senator from Vermont, and by gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, to provide proper legislation upon this subject during the last four years. That is true; much has been done, but I say to the Senator from Alabama that I do not think that is any answer to the proposition suggested by the Senator from Maine, because in truth, stripping ourselves of all party feeling and looking at this matter with perfect impartiality, we must admit that what was attempted to be done by that side of the Chamber was looking very carefully to contingencies which would give them the advantage in the count; and I am free to confess that looking to what was attempted on this side of the Chamber we were not blind to contingencies which might give us the advantage; and I think it so turned out. If we look at the attempts that have been made by the respective sides during the last four years we shall come to the conclusion that each side was looking as much to the term of its own party as it was to providing for a difficulty common to the whole country. That is my honest judgment about it; and as the Senator from Maine has made a most excellent speech I thought I would second his motion.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not agree with my honorable friend from Connecticut as to the intent of the words in this resolution which he proposes to strike out. The language of the resolution as reported from the committee is "that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared." The latter words, "as they shall be declared" are those which my friend proposes to strike out. I cannot agree with him that the intendment of those words in any way conveys the idea of a release of power or control over the count by the two Houses of Congress. If I thought so, I should vote for his amendment; but I do not see any necessity, in view of the fact that the resolution now before the Senate has a precedent, following straight in the line of the unbroken usage and history of the Government, for changing words to which no such meaning has been attached and from which no such effect can be logically deduced as my friend from Connecticut seems to apprehend.

From the foundation of the Government down to the present day, from the first counting of the electoral votes for George Washington until the last count in 1877, no case can be found in which the control of the count of the vote, the ascertainment and declaration of that vote, was not wholly and solely controlled by the two Houses of Congress. There never has been a day in the history of this country when it was conceded by any one act in that history that the Vice-President of the United States ex officio presiding officer of this body, or some other officer appointed by the Senate, and by the Senate alone as the President pro tempore, has undertaken to control or ascertain the electoral votes given for President and Vice-President. Therefore it would be a solecism, worse than a solecism, it would be a fatal precedent changing the very genius and character of this Government whereby the action of a whole people proceeding under an electoral system should dissolve itself in the will, the caprice, the power of one man. Sir, when the day may come that one man shall undertake of his own will to decide what has been the result of an election and to count or not count the proofs of a people's action, then the shadow of a republic will exist, but the substance of an imperial government.

In the present case I do not propose to prolong the discussion by considering whether the two Houses may act under a joint rule, an action by consent for them to put in operation the powers vested in them by the Constitution, or whether it should take the form of legislation. I do not propose to enter upon that subject. There are obvious reasons why the executive power of this Government ought not to have voice or control in the choice of its successor. The history of this Government is against it; the reason of this Government is against it. When the two Houses are exercising this great power, whatever it may be, it is not a power of legislation; it is the power of which they are the special constitutional depositaries, and they act in it without the consent and beyond the control of the executive branch of the Government. And such has been the history of this Government until 1876, when under the form of law a special act was made to meet a time of great peril and public anxiety. That act has passed into history so far as its own provisions are concerned, but one precedent was made by that act which was but confirmatory of the history of the Government. Under the act of 1877 the control of the counting and the ascertainment of the votes for President and Vice-President was assumed by and wholly committed to the two Houses of Congress, to the exclusion of the presiding officer of the Senate. It is true that they chose to delegate their powers, for convenience' sake, to the decision of an electoral tribunal, two-thirds of which was drawn from the two Houses of Congress and the other third from the Supreme Court of the United States. They delegated to that tribunal all the powers of the two Houses in judging of the competency of the electoral votes; that is to say, they were to ascertain and declare which were the votes provided for by the Constitution; but the finding of that electoral tribunal was not final; it was reversible by the joint action of the two Houses; and therefore it was but a delegation sub conditione. The matter came back again to the two Houses, who had the power to set aside any finding of that tribunal, which had been created for the purpose of the more convenient argument and decision of vexed questions, reducing the number of the court for the purposes of administrative convenience.

In the present case a joint rule was adopted a year ago by the Senate and sent to the House of Representatives, from which it has not returned. Further than that I have no parliamentary right to speak. It has not been adopted. That rule has been discussed in this body. It assumes no new control over this subject. It did attempt to provide for certain dangerous contingencies and to settle them in an orderly, lawful, and just manner. I do here aver that the joint rule which passed the Senate in May, 1880, is in my judgment in perfect consonance with and subordination to the spirit and letter of the Constitution, and in accordance with the usage and precedent of congressional action over the subject of electoral votes; but it has been declared to be otherwise, and the country has been misinformed upon the subject. There has been misrepresentation by the public press and elsewhere upon this subject, so that an obstruction has been created to the orderly count of the vote under that rule by the two Houses; and there it stands.

Then what is the duty of the Senate? What is the duty of every man, whether of the minority or majority party of the Senate? In my judgment it is plain: to do that which under the circumstances will in the best manner promote the honest declaration of the last presidential election, and give to the candidates who have received the highest number of electoral votes such a declaration as shall place them fully, substantially, fairly in the offices to which they have been elected. That is all there is of it. That is all that the present action under this resolution is designed to effect. It proposes that we shall not meet as a mob or meet without pre-arrangement, but shall meet in accordance with that decent, orderly, respectful precedent, which is the line of our country's history, and proceed to make declaration of the great powers conferred by the act of a great people in a simple and yet in a dignified and orderly manner. This resolution has that intent and no more. It has that object and none other. The language in which it is couched is that which time has shown has subserved similar purposes in the past. Why, then, not follow it?

When the question comes before the Senate now or at any time, whether it is competent for the Vice-President to assume this power, whatever it may be, which the Constitution has given to the two Houses to assume to declare, to control, to ascertain the result made by the action of the electoral colleges throughout the country, I shall then stand in firm opposition to such an idea, contesting it at every point as revolutionary and dangerous, and I shall stand with the solid history of this country at my back to prove that when such an act shall be attempted it will be a violation of the history of the country, of the constitutional rights of the two Houses, and in the face of the spirit of representative popular government.

I have said this much to explain why it is I shall not vote for the amendment of the honorable Senator from Connecticut. I wish by taking a precedent so consecrated by time and usage as that which has been brought into the Senate, that all opportunity for cavil or for denial shall be taken from those who I am afraid to think have sought occasions for both. I do not wish that there should be room left for doubt as to what is the purpose of the majority of this body in bringing forward a resolution like this. It is to act upon a resolution which has been time tried and tested, every word of which has been weighed, and the consequences of which have been known. It is that there shall be nothing new, nothing left to morbid imagination or to just suspicion, but that by following the language which has led and controlled in the times of the past, we may know as near as men may know what is to be the result of its use in the future. I have no other view than that; I am clear that those who are present on this side have not; and I beg my friend from Connecticut to believe that there is nothing in the intent which he supposes attaches to this language that can for a moment be a basis for the argument that there is a suggestion that the power exists in any one man in this Government, the Vice-President of the United States or the President pro tempore of the Senate, to ascertain and control the count of the electoral votes except it is under the power and control of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I have no doubt of the entire honesty and purity of the honorable Senator from Delaware; I have no doubt that he entirely believes that the passage of the resolution as offered by the committee is all that the public ought to demand; but I beg to say that I differ with him in that matter, and honestly differ. My friend says that four years ago, in the case of the Electoral Commission, the constitutional powers belonging to the Senate and House of Representatives were delegated to a body unknown to the Constitution, and that even then they took steps to determine that that body would not permit the Vice-President of the United States or the President of the Senate to use this power. Why take any steps to do it if that has been the order and rule of the Government for three-quarters of a century? If it was necessary to do it in the establishment of an Electoral Commission in 1877, why not do it now, and let it stand as a precedent for all coming time?

The honorable Senator from Delaware says that there never has been a time, from the inauguration of George Washington down to the present time, when any power of this sort was given to a Vice-President, or a President of the Senate, or any other body. Perhaps the very nature of the circumstances demanded the action, but he surely forgets that the Senate of the United States, or else I am greatly mistaken, before the first inauguration of General Washington did appoint an individual whose sole duty was to count and declare the vote.

Mr. BAYARD. My friend is right in the letter but not in the spirit. The Senate did pass a resolution appointing John Langdon the President pro tempore of the Senate for that purpose only.

Mr. EATON. I understand it.

Mr. BAYARD. But that was before the Government was organized. There must be a time to set machinery in motion before you can speak of the principle on which the machinery proceeds.

Mr. EATON. I believe I observed that it may have been absolutely necessary for the Senate to do something, but they did assume a power that was not given them by the Constitution when they did it.

Mr. BAYARD. But even John Langdon was the appointee of one of the Houses of Congress. If he could have acted ex mero motu, by his own power, they could not have intended to require of him to attempt this thing as the agent of the Houses of Congress. The idea I wish to convey is that whatever power has been exercised has either been by the two Houses, or by those who were their appointees, and there never has been an origination of action on the part of the Vice-President, or anybody else, in relation to this count. The power has proceeded originally from the two Houses whenever this subject came up. If there were tellers to be appointed it was by resolution of the Houses. If the two Houses were to meet it was a resolution of the two Houses that caused them to meet. When did the Vice-President ever summon the two Houses to meet him? They always summon him to meet them; that is to say, they have brought him as the ministerial agent, with the certificates in his possession, to open them in their presence, and then they were counted under their control.

Mr. EATON. I propose to keep it there.

Mr. BAYARD. I propose so, too.

Mr. EATON. My amendment does that, and you will not have any ponton bridge to pass over four years hence, about which my friend from Georgia speaks, if you adopt the proper language of the Constitution.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. We will put down an iron bridge before the next four years.

Mr. EATON. Either my friend from Delaware is greatly mistaken or I am. I see the honorable Senator from Vermont takes a book in his hand; I have not referred to the fact in years, but in my judgment the Senate did assume of itself to appoint John Langdon to count the votes, without going to the House of Representatives and asking them to join in that count at all. If my friend from Vermont has it, I shall be glad to hear it. If I am incorrect, I wish some Senator who has a recollection of the matter would state the fact.

Mr. BAYARD. There is a record of it.

Mr. EATON. There is a record of it, I suppose, and my recollection of that record is that it was the action of the Senate alone and by itself, without any action upon the part of the other House.

Mr. INGALLS. May I read the order for the information of the Senator?

Mr. EATON. I should be very glad to hear it.

Mr. INGALLS. It is as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready in the Senate Chamber to proceed, in the presence of the House, to discharge that duty.

Mr. EATON. Exactly; just as I supposed it was; precisely word for word; absolutely. The Senate appointed John Langdon to do a certain thing, and that was to open and count the votes. They did not ask the House of Representatives to join with them in appointing John Langdon, but they notified the House of his appointment.

Mr. BLAINE. Will my friend submit to another interruption in aid of his argument?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Kansas did not read quite all, and left out a very significant part:

And that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose.

That is, they might do it if they chose, but the Senate would go on whether they did or not.

Mr. EATON. Certainly, the Senate assumed to do it. I am very well aware that that was the commencement of the Government, and that therefore there must have been certain action taken at that time that would be utterly indefensible now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why so?

Mr. EATON. If my friend really and honestly asks me "why so,"

I would ask him if he proposes to pen a resolution appointing the President of the Senate to go into the House of Representatives and count the votes, or if he proposes to send a messenger to the House of Representatives that they may come in here if they please and witness a count of the votes for President and Vice-President by the President of the Senate, notifying them that the Senate has appointed him to do it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think my friend, the Senator from Connecticut, misunderstood my question or the meaning of it. He was saying that it was a necessity at that time, if I understood him.

Mr. EATON. I did say so. I said it might have been then a necessity.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was desirous of knowing, there being a Senate and House of Representatives existing, what were the peculiar circumstances that made it necessary that the Senate should pass the resolution that it did in that way rather than the one that has obtained a good deal of the time since, and I asked in perfect sincerity, in order to get the views of the Senator.

Mr. EATON. I suppose it was because they had not yet learned to do the business accurately, giving to each House its proper power, if each House has proper power. I simply alluded to that to show that this thing had once been done in the history of the country. It may be done again. There are Senators on this floor—I know more than one or two; I will not say how many—who believe, honestly believe, that the Constitution of the United States gives the President of the Senate, not only the right to open the certificates, but to count the votes. My friend does not; I do not. Men of high character, good lawyers, honest men, patriotic men do assert that right; and therefore I say that the majority of the Senate, if they believe as I believe, ought always to stamp their disapprobation upon such a theory. It may be necessary to adopt a constitutional amendment in order that this matter may be properly and finally determined. I do not know but that my honorable friend from Maine is right in that regard. I know I suggested four years ago that, in my judgment, in order to settle this matter beyond all question, there should be a constitutional amendment; and then honest men, patriotic men, would not differ with regard to the meaning of the Constitution. There is a difference now. My friend from Delaware entertains an opinion different from mine. Very likely he is correct; very likely I am wrong; but I must be governed by my own convictions of constitutional right and constitutional law, however weak I may be, and however wrong those convictions may be.

I would do what is necessary to-day not because there is any doubt with regard to who will be declared elected President and Vice-President; I have no doubt, no sane, sensible man has any doubt on that subject; but in God's name let us do it right. Set a precedent, establish a rule, and let us all vote for it, a rule that determines that the officer presiding over this body has nothing to do with the count of the votes. Let it go down to our successors. My public life will be over in thirty days. I go out of this body never to return, never under any circumstances. My public life is ended. I go out of it devotedly attached to the Constitution of our common country. I shall make no motion, offer no amendment, utter no word that in my judgment is not necessary in order to maintain that instrument in its full power and to maintain the honor of our common country.

Mr. President, if I vote alone, I shall vote against the resolution as it is constituted, hoary though it may be with age, covered all over though it may be with the barnacles of the past. I will not vote for it any more than I would vote, if I were here four years hence, for another electoral commission. God help us, there is precedent for an electoral commission.

A word now in regard to a remark made by the honorable Senator from Ohio. He says if he had lived seventy-five years ago and had been called upon to draw a resolution on this subject, he would not have drawn it as this is. He ought not to draw it now, then. With the experience of seventy-five years, let a change be made. If it was wrong then, it is wrong now. Age does not make it right. Why would he have drawn it differently? Because it does not express his opinion, I apprehend, and for no other reason.

Then, how did he meet my amendment? He met my amendment in this way, with this language, that under no circumstances would he vote for my amendment, because there might be a bogus return coming here from Oregon or somewhere, and that bogus return would be opened by the President of the Senate. What has that to do with my amendment? If there are forty bogus returns, they have nothing to do with it. When a bogus return is read, as it may be, either under my amendment or under the resolution without my amendment, the two Houses will object, and that will be the end of the bogus return. It has nothing to do either with the original resolution or with the amendment which I have had the honor to offer. It does not meet the question.

I did not intend to detain the Senate for the time that I have consumed, but before leaving the floor I want to say one word further in regard to another part of this resolution. My friend from Georgia—and he knows how highly I esteem him—and my friend from Ohio have both said that the vote of Georgia cannot be counted. Now, I agree with my friend from Arkansas and my friend from Florida who have spoken on that question. I am not going into the argument of the question. I think I can sustain them beyond a doubt, or a possibility of contradiction in my own mind that the vote of Georgia has a right to be counted, that a declaratory law of Congress cannot disfranchise a million of people, that a mere declaratory law of Congress cannot disfranchise New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts if they happen to err in the day on which they voted. But I will not take time. I simply wish to say that I agree with my friends from Florida and Arkansas.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will my friend from Connecticut allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I concur fully with him that no law of Congress can disfranchise a State; but may a State not fail to make her vote available by her own failure to comply with the law?

Mr. EATON. I have not time to argue the question now; but I want to say just this one word, and I want to commend it to my friend from Georgia and my friend from Ohio, and that is, if the vote of Georgia was cast a week behind time, born a little too late, if the vote of Georgia would have elected Winfield Scott Hancock President of the United States, we would have found a way to count that vote. I will not argue the constitutionality of the question to-day at all; but agreeing as I did in a great deal that was said by my honorable friend from Maine, I rather think that the distinguished Senator from Ohio and my good friend from Georgia and I and all the rest of us would have found some way to count that vote.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I agree very cordially with the last remark of my friend from Connecticut, and if there had been a republican majority on this side—I want to match him in frankness—we should have found overwhelming reasons for rejecting the vote of Georgia. [Laughter.]

The Senator from Alabama spoke in rather reproachful terms that I had done nothing in regard to what I had stated was a great public want.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg to say to the honorable Senator that I was apologizing for him; I was not reproaching him.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know that a committee can be appointed now to reach over the recess; but I give notice that on the first day of the spring session of the Senate, as there will probably be one, I shall move for the raising of a committee of the Senate—of which I am not willing to be a member—a committee of five, to sit during the recess and report on the first Monday of December next a remedy for this evil. I am going to make it an impartial committee. I want to have two republicans on it and two democrats, and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] for chairman. [Laughter.]

That will be organized as fairly as the electoral commission, to say the least; and then if I could instruct that committee, I would say, in answer to the intimation of the honorable Senator from Delaware that I should be a member, that nothing but a constitutional amendment can remedy the difficulty, and one of the first points of that amendment should be that, whereas the electoral system of counting must be maintained, yet I believe that one of the first steps should be to allow the voter of this country to put the name of the President and Vice-President on his ticket for whom he votes instead of doing it through the medium of electors. California was honestly carried by Hancock. Why should Hancock be deprived of one of the votes of California because there was a prejudice against Judge Terry?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was because the voters preferred to have Garfield President than Terry elector.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, but that is not a fair consideration, even if you admit the force of it, which would be a very great stretch of the imagination. Garfield honestly carried Indiana, and yet by a mere sliding up and down of one of the names of the electors, he came very near being deprived of a vote there. This election was not so close that a single vote here or there made any difference; but it was the single elector over which we had the fight in 1876; and had either of these incidents occurred in 1876 it would have caused great convulsion in the country. There is not one voter in the United States out of every ten, taking the people by and large as we run, who understands the electoral system or ever gave any attention to it. Those who have stood around the polls on election day, as all good citizens ought to do, have not failed to note when an intelligent man comes up and asks for a ticket and you hand it to him, he is very apt to say, "I want to vote for Garfield; I do not see his name here." Another man wants to vote for Hancock; why should he not have the right to do it directly.

I undertake further to say that in as large a State as New York or Pennsylvania or Ohio or Illinois, where the electoral vote runs from twenty-one to thirty-five, there is not one voter in every ten thousand in the State who knows the ticket he votes so far that he can certify the correctness of the names he has voted for—not one. The last week of a campaign now in a presidential election consists largely in placarding every advertising stand in the country with great illuminated names of the electors, and warning every republican voter of the deep, intense villainy of the democracy, who want to slip a wrong name on the ticket; and the democracy, to repay the compliment, have great placards out warning their voters of the intentional scoundrelism of the republicans; and so it goes on both sides.

Mr. EATON. Is there no truth in that?

Mr. BLAINE. I am not discussing that, neither affirming nor denying it. But even if you post up an illuminated list of the electors and hand the ticket to the voter, so few people have ever been trained to the art of proof-reading that not even then would one voter in twenty-five be able to say in an electoral vote for twenty-five men whether the names were correctly transcribed on the ticket he held in his hand. As long as you maintain the system of voting by electors, just so long you are offering an enormous temptation for all kinds of irregularity, all kinds of trickery, as is practiced to a large extent, and attempted to be practiced to a still larger extent, but happily defeated by the vigilance of one side or the other from proving very disastrous.

That would be the first contribution I would make to this committee, which the Senator from Illinois, I am sure, will gracefully preside over; and the next I would make would be that I would go back to the early system of voting by districts. I do not believe anything else was ever contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. I do not believe that the vote of a State should be submerged when it is about equally divided, by an accidental majority of a few thousand, out of a million of voters, saying that the whole electoral vote of New York shall go either one way or the other. It was a party necessity that overthrew it under the leadership of one of the greatest partisans the country has ever produced, Mr. Van Buren. Things were reversed then. The State of New York was democratic, the city of New York was whig; they were voting by districts and carried an uncomfortable minority for the whig side; but with a general vote that city could be submerged; and so it was done. Now, in the whirligig of time, it has just turned around, and rural New York is republican and the city of New York is largely democratic.

I do not pretend to touch upon the mode of securing a fair count and a fair return; I do not pretend to have digested in one moment upon my feet that which has baffled the ingenuity of so many lawyers and statesmen for these many years, but I am very sure that a committee of this body can be found who will be able to prepare a scheme that, wrought into a constitutional amendment, will guard the future of this country against the dangers which we have been discussing here to-day, and I believe it would give the widest possible satisfaction if the people could have restored to them the district system of voting and the individual voter could have bestowed upon him the right to know precisely who it was that he was voting for, and have the name plainly printed upon his ticket. It is not in the least degree in conflict with counting by the electoral system and harmonizing it precisely as well as though you put the name of a blank man—for the elector has become that merely—upon the ticket, instead of the name of the presidential elector.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I simply rise to say that while I concur entirely with the Senator from Connecticut in the amendment he has offered as a separate proposition, yet in view of existing circumstances I apprehend very seriously that the adoption of his amendment in this particular emergency may endanger the passage of the resolution by the time required, and I prefer, as a practical man, not to do that. I think we had better adhere to the resolution as reported.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAILEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] on all political questions. I do not know how far that extends, and I prefer not to vote.

Mr. EATON, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING;] but from the position assumed heretofore by the Senator from New York on this question, I have no doubt that his opinion would coincide with mine, and therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] As this does not strike me as being a political question, I vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 27, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—27.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Baldwin, | Eaton, | Logan, | Pugh, |
| Blair, | Edmunds, | McDonald, | Saunders, |
| Bruce, | Hill of Colorado, | McMillan, | Teller, |
| Burnside, | Hoar, | McPherson, | Vest, |
| Cameron of Wis., | Ingalls, | Morrill, | Williams, |
| Cockrell, | Kellogg, | Pendleton, | Windom. |
| Dawes, | Kirkwood, | Plumb, | |

NAYS—33.

| Allison, | Farley, | Jones of Florida, | Slater, |
| Anthony, | Garland, | Kernan, | Thurman, |
| Bayard, | Groome, | Lamar, | Vance, |
| Beck, | Hampton, | Morgan, | Voorhees, |
| Butler, | Harris, | Platt, | Walker, |
| Call, | Hereford, | Randolph, | Withers. |
| Coke, | Hill of Georgia, | Ransom, | |
| Davis of Illinois, | Johnston, | Rollins, | |

ABSENT—16.

| Bailey, | Cameron of Pa., | Grover, | Paddock, |
| Blaine, | Carpenter, | Hamlin, | Sharon, |
| Booth, | Conkling, | Jones of Nevada, | Wallace, |
| Brown, | Ferry, | Maxey, | Whyte. |

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise to offer any amendment but simply to remark that, not wishing to take up time, I did not say anything in respect to my vote upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut. I voted for it, however, with pleasure, but for entirely different reasons, as I presume other Senators did, from those stated by the Senator from Connecticut. That is all I wish to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is one amendment that I think ought to be made that I presume will not meet with any opposition from the Senator in charge of the measure. The amendment as it now stands is simply this in its opening clause, and that is all to which I shall refer now:

That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 9th of February, 1881, at twelve o'clock m.

I think it would be well to put in "meridian" there instead of "m.," and I presume there will be no objection to that being changed by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then "and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared," &c., without stating what they are, what the votes are for. The committee has followed the resolution of 1837, it is perfectly true; but at the same time it is rather loose. Therefore I move to amend by inserting in the third line of the matter printed in italics after the word "meridian" the words "pursuant to the requirement of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States," so as to attach it to the occasion. It is a mere matter of form to make it more clear. It looks rather bald as it is.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to those words being inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I think that is a most excellent amendment, because it exactly marks the distance which the resolution goes in pursuance of the Constitution and indicates that the remainder of the resolution is not in accordance therewith.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. THURMAN. I think there is no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on adopting the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution as amended.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to. So it was—

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) 1. That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 9th of February, 1881, at twelve o'clock meridian, pursuant to the requirement of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States; and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

2. That if it shall appear that any votes of electors for President or Vice-President of the United States have been given on a day other than that fixed for casting such votes by act of Congress, in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, if the counting or omitting to count such votes shall not essentially change the result of the election, they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of electors cast on the —— day of ——, 1880, to be counted, the result would be for A B for President of the United States —— votes, and for C D for President of the United States —— votes; if not counted, the result would be for A B for President of the United States —— votes, and for C D for President of the United States —— votes; but in either event —— is elected President of the United States. And in the same manner for Vice-President.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate resumes the consideration of the special order, which is the unfinished business that has been laid aside informally, the Indian severalty bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No; the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending order is the pension appropriation bill, for which the Indian severalty bill was temporarily laid aside.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the Senator from Ohio will withdraw that and let us finish the appropriation bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. If I can get the ear of the Senate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, which is not debatable.

Mr. VOORHEES. Allow me to appeal to the Senator from Ohio for a moment. I may be compelled to be absent from the Senate to-morrow. I desire to submit some remarks, which will occupy about twenty minutes, on the measure proposed to the Senate by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS,] and if the Senate will allow me to do so now, I shall be much obliged.

Mr. THURMAN. There is so much disorder that I cannot hear a word. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has the floor on the pension bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will make the appeal to him when I get a chance. If the Senator from Ohio will withdraw his motion, I shall then ask the kindness of the Senator from Illinois to occupy fifteen or twenty minutes now, because I may be compelled to leave the city to-morrow, and if I can be allowed to be heard to-night I shall embrace the opportunity of doing so, because I suppose the bill will be disposed of to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. LOGAN. If it can be understood that I shall have the floor, of course I have no objection.

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana for that purpose, if the Senate will adjourn when he gets through and let me go on in the morning.

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, the pending question being whether the amendment offered by Mr. WITHERS was in order under Rule 29 of the standing rules of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. One word before the Senator from Indiana proceeds. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] has very correctly stated to me that the Indian severalty bill was the pending order. The pension bill was taken up by general consent and the other bill laid aside informally. I just want to correct the statement I made, so that no Senator need be under a misapprehension.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has a right to call up his bill.

Mr. COKE. I want it understood that the Indian severalty bill is laid aside informally in order to accommodate the Senator from Indiana on the pension bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to laying aside the pending order informally for the purpose of taking up the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, thanking the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Illinois for the opportunity of addressing the Senate at this time, I shall proceed to do so.

The Commissioner of Pensions asks for additional legislation for the purpose of preventing and detecting fraud; and a bill (No. 496) has been introduced at his suggestion and is now offered as an amendment to the pension appropriation bill. This bill provides for the appointment of a lawyer and a surgeon in each congressional district in the United States. There are two hundred and ninety-eight congressional districts, and the bill asks to create five hundred and eighty-four Federal officers.

It provides that in each district the lawyer and the surgeon shall disagree in politics. In other words, that if a republican lawyer shall be appointed a democratic surgeon shall be appointed to watch him, and if a democatic lawyer is appointed a republican surgeon shall stand guard. These examiners and surgeons are to take declarations and testimony of applicants for pensions and witnesses. They must visit each county or city in their respective districts at least three times a year. In addition to this they must visit such places as the Commissioner of Pensions may direct. In case a pensioner or witness is sick, the examiner and surgeon must visit him. The third section of the bill provides the Commissioner may dispense with the services of these lawyers and surgeons whenever he may desire.

The next section provides for a board of surgeons, and the following section provides that the declaration for pensions or bounty land may be made precisely as it now is. The seventh section makes the Commissioner supreme, and the eighth provides for the appointment of a kind of surgeon-general for the Pension Bureau with a salary of $2,500 per annum. The presumption is that this surgeon-general is to have the final say upon the question of disability in each case.

You must not forget that this additional legislation is asked on the ground that there is not sufficient law at present to make it possible for the Commissioner of Pensions to prevent fraud. I will call your attention to the law as it now stands, and you can then determine whether any more legislation is absolutely necessary for the discovery of fraud.

Section 4744 Revised Statutes is as follows:

The Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to detail, from time to time, clerks in his office to investigate suspected attempts at fraud on the Government through and by virtue of the provisions of the pension laws, and to aid in prosecuting any person so offending, with such additional compensation as is customary in cases of special service; and any person so detailed shall have the power to administer oaths and take affidavits in the course of any such investigation.

It will be seen that this section authorizes the Commissioner of Pensions to send, if necessary, all the clerks in his office anywhere in the country to investigate any suspected claim, and report to him.

Section 4471 is as follows:

In all cases of application for the payment of pensions to invalid pensioners to the 4th day of September of an odd year, the certificate of an examining surgeon duly appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions, or of a surgeon of the Army or Navy, stating the continuance of the disability for which the pension was originally granted, describing it, and the degree of such disability at the time of making the certificate, shall be required to accompany the vouchers, and a duplicate thereof shall be filed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions; and if in a case of continued disability it shall be stated at a degree below that for which the pension was originally granted or was last paid, the pensioner shall only be paid for the quarter then due at the rate stated in the certificate. But where the pension was originally granted for a disability in consequence of the loss of a limb or other essential portion of the body, or for other cause which cannot either in whole or in part be removed, or when a disability is certified by competent examining surgeons to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions to have become permanent in a degree equal to the whole rate of pension, the above certificate shall not be necessary to entitle the pensioner to payment.

The next section, No. 4772, authorizes the Commissioner of Pensions to have a pensioner examined just as often as he desires. It is as follows:

Nothing in the preceding section shall be construed to prevent the Commissioner of Pensions from requiring a more frequent examination, if, in his judgment, it is necessary.

Section No. 4773 is as follows:

The biennial certificate of two unappointed civil surgeons shall not be accepted in any case, except upon satisfactory evidence that an examination by a commissioned or duly appointed surgeon is impracticable.

The Senate will see that by this section, although the pensioner has been examined by two civil surgeons, the Commissioner is not bound to take their certificate unless he has satisfactory evidence that the examination could not be made by a duly appointed surgeon, and even then, under previous sections, he has the right to have the pensioner examined just as often as he may suspect that an examination may disclose anything of benefit to the United States.

Section 4774 is as follows:

The Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to organize, at his discretion, boards of examining surgeons, not to exceed three members, and each member of a board thus organized who is actually present and makes, in connection with other members or member, an ordered or periodical examination, shall be entitled to the fee of $1, on the receipt of a proper certificate of such examination by the Commissioner of Pensions.

It is plain that under this section the Commissioner of Pensions has already the right to organize, at his discretion, a board of examining surgeons consisting of three members, and he can have every pensioner examined as often as he pleases by such board, under the law as it now is.

The next section, 4775, is as follows:

Examining surgeons duly appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions, and such other qualified surgeons as may be employed in the Pension Office, may be required by him, from time to time, as he deems for the interests of the Government, to make special examinations of pensioners, or applicants for pensions, and such examinations shall have precedence over previous examinations, whether special or biennial; but when injustice is alleged to have been done by an examination so ordered, the Commissioner of Pensions may, at his discretion, select a board of three duly appointed examining surgeons, who shall meet at a place to be designated by him, and shall review such cases as may be ordered before them on appeal from any special examination, and the decision of such board shall be final on the question so submitted thereto, provided the Commissioner approve the same. The compensation of each of such surgeons shall be $3, and shall be paid out of any appropriations made for the payment of pensions, in the same manner as the ordinary fees of appointed surgeons are or may be authorized to be paid.

By this section the Commissioner of Pensions can have all the surgeons he wants, and, whenever he deems it to the interest of the Government, he can require them to make a special examination of any pensioner, or of any applicant for pension, and such examination shall have precedence over all others, and if any injustice is alleged to have been done the Commissioner may, at his discretion, select another board of examining surgeons for the purpose of reviewing all cases that may be laid before it; but the decision even of this court is not final unless it is approved by the Commissioner.

Section No. 4777 is as follows:

The Commissioner of Pensions is empowered to appoint, at his discretion, civil surgeons to make the periodical examination of pensioners which are or may be required by law, and to examine applicants for pensions where he deems an examination by a surgeon appointed by him necessary; and the fee for such examinations and the requisite certificates thereof, in duplicate, including postage on such as are transmitted to pension agents, shall be $2, which shall be paid by the agent for paying pensions in the district within which the pensioner or claimant resides, out of any money appropriated for the payment of pensions, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe.

This section authorizes the Commissioner of Pensions to appoint all the civil surgeons he may want for the purpose of having the applicants examined whenever and wherever he deems an examination necessary.

You will see that under the section already quoted the Commissioner of Pensions has ample authority to do anything he pleases so far as the examination of pensioners is concerned. Every suspicion he may entertain can be at once verified by any number of surgeons and any number of special agents. At the present time he has at least forty special agents constantly traveling for the purpose of finding evidence of some fraud in some pension claim. The whole business of the office is transacted upon the idea that every application is a fraud, that all affidavits are untrue, and that, as a matter of fact, very few people were disabled in the late war.

In addition to the sections I have already called your attention to, there are others of equal importance. Section 184 is as follows:

Any head of a Department or bureau in which a claim against the United States is properly pending may apply to any judge or clerk of any court of the United States in any State, District or Territory, to issue a subpœna for any witness being within the jurisdiction of such court, to appear at a time and place in the subpœna stated, before any officer authorized to take depositions to be used in the courts of the United States, there to give full and true answers to such written interrogatories and cross-interrogatories as may be submitted with the application, or to be orally examined and cross-examined upon the subject of such claim.

By this section the Secretary of the Interior, or the Commissioner of Pensions if he is the head of a bureau, may apply to any judge or clerk of any court of the United States, in any District, Territory or State, to issue a subpœna for any witness within the jurisdiction of such court, commanding the witness to appear before any officer authorized to take depositions, and to answer all interrogatories that may be submitted to such witness; and this he has a right to do whenever he suspects that any claim against the United States is fraudulent. And section 186 provides for the punishment of any witness who, when subpœnaed, will not testify.

In order to see how difficult it is to perpetrate a fraud upon the Pension Bureau, allow me to tell you what a man has to do to get it.

First, he has to make an application, and this application has to state his name, age, height, occupation, color of hair, color of eyes, where and when he enlisted, in what company, who were his officers, when, where, and for what reason he was discharged, if he was wounded when and where, the extent of his wound, and, in fact, a full description of himself, of his wound or malady. This must be sworn to before a court of record, and in addition, the applicant has to be identified by two witnesses.

Second. There must be the affidavit of a commissioned officer that the affidavits set forth in the application are true; and if there is no commissioned officer the applicant must produce two of his comrades to swear that such affidavits are true, and they must state their means of knowledge. The application is then sent to the Pension Bureau. The next step is to have it referred to the War Department for the purpose of seeing, first, whether the name of the applicant is on the rolls of the War Department; whether he enlisted at the time he stated, and whether he was discharged at the time stated; whether he was borne on the rolls at the time he is stated to have been wounded, and whether, according to the daily reports he was on hand. The same test is made with regard to his two comrades. If he has ever signed the pay-rolls, that signature is compared with the signature to his application. In the same way his comrades are tested, and in the same way their signatures are compared; and the records must show that the comrades were there at the time. If all this is satisfactory and everything appears to be right, the claimant is then examined by a surgeon of the Pension Office, and then, as a rule, there is a second examination before a board of three surgeons. Not satisfied yet, still suspecting a fraud, the applicant is required to produce the affidavit of his family physician, if he ever had one, or of some physician who has been acquainted with him, showing the condition of the claimant from the time of his discharge from the Army to the time of his application for a pension not only, but his then condition. If he never had a family physician, then he must prove all these facts by his neighbors. If, after all this has been done, the Commissioner of Pensions still suspects that it is not all right, he can then send one of his special agents to examine the applicant and report on his case. If that report is all right and the Commissioner still has a suspicion, he can write to the postmaster in regard not only to the claimant's condition as to bodily health, but as to his moral character and as to the moral character of the witnesses. If not then satisfied he can order the applicant before a special board of surgeons to be appointed by himself.

We must also remember that if, after all this has been done, and the applicant's claim has been allowed and his name put on the roll as a pensioner of the United States, at any time thereafter, whenever a suspicion works itself into the brain of the Commissioner, he can order this pensioner to be re-examined, and can send another special agent, or as many as he may desire, to examine his case.

It seems to me that the Commissioner of Pensions has power enough already, and it is hard to see the necessity of five hundred and eighty-four additional Federal officers. If any considerable number of frauds have been perpetrated upon the Pension Office, with all the power already in the hands of the Commissioner that I have shown to exist, it is not the fault of the law.

I have not time now to describe all that an applicant has to do if she happens to be a widow with several children. The amount of evidence it takes to substantiate a marriage, a birth, or a death, is something absolutely amazing. Every possible and conceivable objection is made, and every flaw is found, so that, as a matter of fact, the greatest misfortune a widow has to contend with after the death of her husband is the prosecution of her claim for a pension.

Another reason, however, urged for the passage of this bill, is the alleged dishonesty of the pension agents who practice before the Commissioner under the law as it now is. Every one of them is entirely and absolutely under the control of the Commissioner himself and the Secretary of the Interior. The Commissioner complains that they practice frauds, and put up jobs on him to the extent of millions of dollars per annum. He has all the power that legislation can give him to detect the guilty and have them punished. He has also the power to stop the practice of any pension agent upon even a suspicion of his integrity. Suppose the judge of a court with a hundred lawyers practicing before him should loudly accuse them, or some of them, of corruption in his court, of forging papers, suborning witnesses, falsifying records, suppressing testimony, and packing juries, and yet should disbar none of the alleged culprits, though with full power to do so. What heed would be given to his charges except in so far as they affected himself. The Commissioner of Pensions has plenary power now, under the law, to strike the name of any attorney or agent from his rolls, shut him out from the Department, prosecute, hunt him down with criminal prosecution, and put him in the penitentiary for his offenses if he has committed any. Let him execute the laws rather than ask for additional legislation.

Sir, the object of this bill seems to be to cast suspicion on all pension claims. Like the pamphlets and letters of the Commissioner, it appears to be saturated with the idea that a pensioner is always ready and willing to commit a fraud on the Government, and that a pension, when he gets it, is a gratuity. I deny this assumption from beginning to end. The pensioners and applicants for pensions are as honest as other men, and have given quite as much evidence of friendship for the Government as those who asperse them. Nor do I regard the payment of his pension as a charity; it is the payment of a debt. A pensioner is a creditor, not a pauper. When the Government pays him his pension it does not bestow alms; it discharges an honest obligation. It is the fulfillment of a contract between the Government and the soldier. The soldier has complied with his part of the contract on the fields of war in hardships, weariness, and pain. His wounds are his vouchers, and such evidence is sufficient for me. Others may take care of the illustrious and the fortunate. They may even create new offices for them and grant them high-sounding titles, but while I have the honor to represent a State upon this floor I shall keep the contract with the wounded, torn, and shattered of the rank and file.

Mr. BOOTH. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is entitled to the floor. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Before putting that question, the Chair will lay before the Senate the regular order, which is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. No. 1773) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes. The Senator from Illinois, the Chair understands, is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LOGAN. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-one minutes) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 2, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. CRAVENS, by unanimous consent, the letter from the Secretary of the Interior relative to the Hot Springs reservation in Arkansas, referred on yesterday to the Committee on the Public Lands, was directed to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REVOLUTIONARY BATTLE-FIELD OF BENNINGTON.

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up at this time Senate bill No. 1505, relative to the revolutionary battle-field of Bennington.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized, and is hereby directed, to pay to the governor of the State of Vermont the sum of $40,000 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be by him transferred to the Bennington Monument Association, which has raised an equal amount, for the erection of a proposed monument to commemorate the revolutionary battle of Bennington.

SEC. 2. That no moneys shall be paid out of the Treasury for the benefit of such association until the design for its monument shall have been approved by the President of the United States, or by a commission appointed by him for the purpose, and a board of three Army officers appointed by him shall have reported to him that the moneys already raised, together with the sum hereby appropriated from the Treasury of the United States, shall be sufficient to complete the monument in accordance with the design approved by him or by the commission appointed by him.

Amend the title so as to read, "A bill relative to the revolutionary battle-field of Bennington."

The SPEAKER. There being no objection to the present consideration of the bill, the question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOYCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM R. WILMER.

Mr. HENKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration House bill No. 301 for the relief of William R. Wilmer, and move to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the same, and ask that it be put upon its passage. This bill has been before the House for six years, and it is important that action should be taken upon it speedily.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in adjusting the accounts of William R. Wilmer, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Maryland, to credit him with the sum of $1,813.54, that being the amount in value of internal-revenue stamps and cash of which the safe in his office was robbed by burglars on the night of the 27th of April, 1875, and which have not been recovered: Provided, That it shall appear to the satisfaction of said Secretary that said Wilmer was robbed without any collusion or privity on his part.

Mr. HENKLE. I ask that the report accompanying the bill be read, which explains the facts in connection with it and the finding of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The report was read.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would like to inquire, Mr. Speaker, of the gentleman from Maryland, as I do not quite gather from the reading of the report, whether the $1,000 in question is included in the relief to be afforded by this bill? It is plain that the stamps lost are provided for; but I have forgotten the exact language of the bill in that respect as to whether provision is made for the money lost or not.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is plain that it does not provide for that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes the cash lost was funds belonging to the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON. The report so alleges, but the bill does not propose to give any relief whatever on account of that item.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAGE. I shall not object, but desire to state that I have a similar bill on the Speaker's table, and I shall ask to take it up tomorrow morning and pass it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad, if in his power, to recognize the gentleman to make such request.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

PORT OF GALVESTON, TEXAS.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, at this time, to present a memorial of the State Legislature of Texas; and ask that the same be read, printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope the gentleman will allow it to be simply printed in the RECORD, and not ask to have it read at this time.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the memorial to which the gentleman refers will be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES. Very well. I have no objection to that.

The memorial is as follows:

Joint resolution regarding the port of Galveston.

Whereas the State of Texas and the States and Territories north and west of it comprise a vast extent of country possessing great and varied resources which are being developed by a rapidly increasing population, whose immense grain, cotton, and other productions require cheap and adequate communication with the markets of the world, which cannot be afforded by long and expensive land carriage, the most important interests of producers and consumers demanding a near outlet to water transportation; and

Whereas the port of Galveston is the nearest practicable port for said region to the markets of South America, Mexico, Europe, and the Atlantic coast, only requiring, in order to furnish accommodations for all present and future commerce of those States, that its bar be deepened so as to admit vessels drawing over thirteen feet of water; and

Whereas commercial justice requires that the Federal Government should afford proper facilities for the protection and development of the commerce of the South and West, as well as cultivate trade relations with Mexico and South America; and

Whereas the improvement of Galveston Harbor is a matter of national importance, which fact is being realized, as in part appears from a bill recently introduced in Congress by Mr. H. PRICE, of Iowa, and Mr. THOMAS RYAN, of Kansas, setting forth the necessities for the work and providing for an appropriation of $1,000,000 to be used in deepening the channel over the bar into the harbor of Galveston for admission of ocean steamers drawing twenty-six feet of water, which action is appreciated by the people of Texas: Therefore,

SECTION 1. Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Texas, That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives in Congress be requested to urge by all proper exertions the early passage of said bill, and such other measures having the like object in view, which they may deem expedient, in addition to the current appropriations which their earnest efforts have already secured for that purpose.

SEC. 2. Be it further resolved, That the Legislatures of Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Arkansas, Iowa, and all others that are interested, be, and are hereby, requested to take into consideration the same subject, and take appropriate action for the advancement of their agricultural and commercial interests, by aiding in the accomplishment of this work, by memorializing Congress, and by such other means as they may think advisable.

SEC. 3. Be it further resolved, That the governor of Texas be requested to transmit copies of these resolutions to the governors and Legislatures of the States named, and ask their co-operation, and also to transmit copies hereof to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

SEC. 4. The fact that the Legislatures of several of the States mentioned in this resolution are in session, and the Congress of the United States is in session, and is soon to adjourn, and to be effective this resolution should reach said several legislative bodies speedily, creates a public necessity for the suspension of the rule requiring bills to be read on three several days, and creates an emergency that this resolution should take effect from and after its passage, and it is so enacted.

Approved, January 24, 1881.

STATE OF TEXAS, DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, T. H. Bowman, secretary of State of the State of Texas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original joint resolution of the Legislature of Texas regarding the port of Galveston, approved January 24, 1881, the original enrolled joint resolution being now on file in this department.

Witness my official signature and the seal of State, at the city of Austin, the 25th day of January, A. D. 1881.

[SEAL.]

T. H. BOWMAN,
Secretary of State.

PETACA LAND GRANT.

Mr. VALENTINE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6720) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico known as the Petaca grant, numbered 105, in the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico, dated February 20, 1875, recommending the same for confirmation, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to José Julian Martinez and the other claimants named in the juridical possession of said grant: Provided, That this confirmation shall only be construed as a quitclaim or relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall not affect the adverse rights of any person or persons to the land so confirmed.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a patent upon the survey of said grant, approved by the surveyor-general of New Mexico December 6, 1878, now on file in his office, upon the payment to the United States of the costs of said survey as provided by law.

Mr. VALENTINE. The report by the committee is unanimous. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3555) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico, beg leave to report:

That this claim is known as the Petaca grant, No. 105, and is situated in the county of Rio Arriba, New Mexico; that under the eighth section of the act of July 22, 1854, (Statutes at Large, volume 10, page 308,) the claimants of this grant filed a petition with the surveyor-general of New Mexico for the confirmation of their title, based upon a grant said to have been made February 25, 1836, to José Julian Martinez and others by Alvino Perez, then civil and military governor of the Territory of New Mexico; that on March 25, 1836, judicial possession was given by José Antonio Martinez, alcalde of the jurisdiction of Santa Cruz del Ojo Caliente, the boundaries being fully described therein in a letter of the honorable Commissioner of the General Land Office of date March 31, 1880, which is herewith submitted as a part of this report.

Your committee are satisfied from all the facts and record in this case that this grant should be confirmed, and therefore recommend a substitute for the bill No. 3555, as suggested by the honorable Commissioner of the General Land Office in his letter before referred to.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 31, 1880.

SIR: I am in receipt of a letter dated 15th instant, from W. W. Reynolds, esq., clerk of the Committee on Private Land Claims, House of Representatives, inclosing, by direction of said committee, a paper entitled "An act to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico," and requesting an opinion and such information as this office may possess in reference thereto.

In connection with the matter, I have the honor to state that the private land claim in question is known as the Petaca grant, No. 105, in Rio Arriba County, New Mexico.

Under the eighth section of the act of July 22, 1854, (10 Stat., 308), the claimants of this grant filed a petition w th the surveyor-general of New Mexico for the confirmation of their title, based upon a grant said to have been made February 25, 1836, to José Julian Martinez et al. by Alvino Perez, then civil and military governor of the Territory of New Mexico. March 25, 1836, juridical possession was given by José Antonio Martinez, alcalde of the jurisdiction of Santa Cruz del Ojo Caliente, the boundaries being described therein as follows: "On the south the entrance to the canoncito and lands of José Miguel Lucero; on the north the hill commonly called the Tio Ortiz hill; on the east the creek of the Aguage of the Petaca; and on the west the boundary of the Vallecito grant."

From the testimony taken by the surveyor-general it appears that this grant has always been settled and occupied, except when the inhabitants were driven off by the Indians, and that the town of Petaca was in existence at the time of the occupation of New Mexico in 1846 by the military force of the United States, and at the date of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in 1848.

The surveyor-general, in his report of February 20, 1875, states that he has "no doubt that the papers of original title are genuine, and that present claimants are acting in good faith," and therefore recommends "that this grant be confirmed to José Julian Martinez and others named in the act of possession or their legal representatives by Congress." A transcript of this report and of the accompanying title papers and testimony were transmitted by the honorable Secretary of the Interior to each the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, with his letters of March 2, 1876. Additional evidence in this case was also transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives with your letter of February 6, 1879.

The surveyor-general of the Territory of New Mexico, whose duty it is, under the law, to examine and pass upon the validity of all private land claims in said Territory presented to him for adjudication, having reported that the original title papers in this case are believed to be genuine, I know of no objection to the confirmation of this grant by Congress.

It is proposed by the bill in question to confirm the grant according to a survey approved by Surveyor-General Atkinson December 6, 1878. This survey is on file in this office, and appears to conform substantially to the boundaries named in the juridical possession. It contains an area of 186,977.11 acres, being an average of about 4,350 acres to each claimant. The particular tract awarded to and held by each claimant in severalty does not contain this average, but the surplus contained within said boundaries and not so claimed, it would seem, is held for the common benefit of all.

I inclose a draught of a bill prepared in this office which I would suggest as a substitute for the bill in question.

The letter of Mr. Reynolds and inclosure are herewith transmitted; also a tracing of the survey in question.

Very respectfully,

J. A. WILLIAMSON,
Commissioner.

Hon. C. SCHURZ,
Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. REAGAN. If this is to give rise to any debate I must object.
Mr. VALENTINE. I do not think it will lead to any debate.
Mr. SIMONTON. Is the bill which has been read the substitute?
Mr. VALENTINE. The committee report the bill (H. R. No. 6729) which has been read as a substitute for the House bill No. 3555. It is the substitute bill which has been read.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 6729, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VALENTINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARGES AGAINST INDIAN AGENTS, ETC.

Mr. SCALES. I desire to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the House of Representatives copies of all papers which have been filed in his office during the last eighteen months relating to complaints and charges against any Indian agent, inspector, clerk, or other officer in the Indian service, and to inform this House what, if any, steps have been taken to prosecute the same.

The resolution was agreed to

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. COX. I move that the morning hour be dispensed with.

The question being taken on Mr. COX's motion, the morning hour was dispensed with, two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

PONCA INDIANS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks leave at this time to present a message from the President.

There was no objection.

The message of the President was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the request of a large number of intelligent and benevolent citizens, and believing that it was warranted by the extraordinary circumstances of the case, on the 18th day of December, 1880, I appointed a commission consisting of George Crook and Nelson A. Miles, brigadier-generals in the Army; William Stickney, of the District of Columbia, and Walter Allen, of Massachusetts, and requested them to confer with the Ponca Indians, in the Indian Territory, and, if in their judgment it was advisable, also with that part of the tribe which remained in Dakota, and "to ascertain the facts in regard to their removal and present condition so far as was necessary to determine the question as to what justice and humanity require should be done by the Government of the United States, and to report their conclusions and recommendations in the premises."

The commission in pursuance of these instructions having visited the Ponca Indians at their homes in the Indian Territory and in Dakota, and made a careful investigation of the subject referred to them, have reported their conclusions and recommendations, and I now submit their report, together with the testimony taken, for the consideration of Congress. A minority report by Mr. Allen is also herewith transmitted.

On the 27th of December, 1880, a delegation of Ponca chiefs from the Indian Territory presented to the Executive a declaration of their wishes, in which they stated that it was their desire "to remain on the lands now occupied by the Poncas in the Indian Territory," and "to relinquish all their right and interest in the lands formerly owned and occupied by the Ponca tribe in the State of Nebraska and the Territory of Dakota;" and the declaration sets forth the compensation which they will accept for the lands to be surrendered, and for the injuries done to the tribe by their removal to the Indian Territory. This declaration, agreeably to the request of the chiefs making it, is herewith transmitted to Congress.

The public attention has frequently been called to the injustice and wrong which the Ponca tribe of Indians has suffered at the hands of the Government of the United States. This subject was first brought before Congress and the country by the Secretary of the Interior in his annual report for the year 1877, in which he said:

> The case of the Poncas seems entitled to especial consideration at the hands of Congress. They have always been friendly to the whites. It is said, and, as far as I have been able to learn, truthfully, that no Ponca ever killed a white man. The orders of the Government always met with obedient compliance at their hands. Their removal from their old homes on the Missouri River was to them a great hardship. They had been born and raised there. They had houses there in which they lived according to their ideas of comfort. Many of them had engaged in agriculture, and possessed cattle and agricultural implements. They were very reluctant to leave all this; but when Congress had resolved upon their removal they finally overcame that reluctance and obeyed. Considering their constant good conduct, their obedient spirit, and the sacrifices they have made, they are certainly entitled to more than ordinary care at the hands of the Government, and I urgently recommend that liberal provision be made to aid them in their new settlement.

In the same volume the report of E. A. Howard, the agent of the Poncas, is published, which contains the following:

> I am of the opinion that the removal of the Poncas from the northern climate of Dakota to the southern climate of the Indian Territory, at the season of the year it was done, will prove a mistake, and that a great mortality will surely follow among the people when they shall have been here for a time and become poisoned with the malaria of the climate. Already the effects of the climate may be seen upon them in the ennui that seems to have settled upon each, and in the large number now sick.
> It is a matter of astonishment to me that the Government should have ordered the removal of the Ponca Indians from Dakota to the Indian Territory without having first made some provision for their settlement and comfort. Before their removal was carried into effect an appropriation should have been made by Congress sufficient to have located them in their new home, by building a comfortable house for the occupancy of every family of the tribe. As the case now is, no appropriation has been made by Congress, except for a sum but little more than sufficient to remove them; no houses have been built for their use, and the result is that these people have been placed on an uncultivated reservation to live in their tents as best they may, and await further legislative action.
> These Indians claim that the Government had no right to move them from their reservation without first obtaining from them by purchase or treaty the title which they had acquired from the Government, and for which they rendered a valuable consideration. They claim that the date of the settlement of their tribe upon the land composing their old reservation is prehistoric; that they were all born there, and that their ancestors from generations back beyond their knowledge were born and lived upon its soil, and that they finally acquired a complete and perfect title from the Government by treaty made with the "Great Father" at Washington, which, they claimed, made it as legitimately theirs as is the home of the white man acquired by gift or purchase.

The subject was again referred to in similar terms in the annual report of the Interior Department for 1878, in the reports of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and of the agent for the Poncas, and in 1879 the Secretary of the Interior said:

> That the Poncas were grievously wronged by their removal from their location on the Missouri River to the Indian Territory, their old reservation having, by a mistake in making the Sioux treaty, been transferred to the Sioux, has been at length and repeatedly set forth in my reports as well as those of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. All that could be subsequently done by this Department in the absence of new legislation to repair that wrong and to indemnify them for their losses has been done with more than ordinary solicitude. They were permitted to select a new location for themselves in the Indian Territory, the Quapaw reserve, to which they had first been taken, being objectionable to them. They chose a tract of country on the Arkansas River and the Salt Fork northwest of the Pawnee reserve. I visited their new reservation personally to satisfy myself of their condition. The lands they now occupy are among the very best in the Indian Territory in point of fertility, well watered and well timbered, and admirably adapted for agriculture as well as stock-raising. In this respect their new reservation is unquestionably superior to that which they left behind them on the Missouri River. Seventy houses have been built by and for them of far better quality than the miserable huts they formerly occupied in Dakota, and the construction of a larger number is now in progress, so that, as the agent reports, every Ponca family will be comfortably housed before January. A very liberal allowance of agricultural implements and stock cattle has been given them, and if they apply themselves to agricultural work there is no doubt that their condition will soon be far more prosperous than it has ever been before. During the first year after their removal to the Indian Territory they lost a comparatively large number of their people by death in consequence of the change of climate, which is greatly to be deplored; but their sanitary condition is now very much improved. The death rate among them during the present year has been very low, and the number of cases of sickness is constantly decreasing. It is thought that they are now sufficiently acclimated to be out of danger.

A committee of the Senate, after a very full investigation of the subject, on the 31st of May, 1880, reported their conclusions to the Senate, and both the majority and minority of the committee agreed that "a great wrong had been done to the Ponca Indians." The majority of the committee says:

> Nothing can strengthen the Government in a just policy to the Indians so much as a demonstration of its willingness to do ample and complete justice whenever it can be shown that it has inflicted a wrong upon a weak and trusting tribe. It is impossible for the United States to hope for any confidence to be reposed in them by the Indian until there shall be shown on their part a readiness to do justice.

The minority report is equally explicit as to the duty of the Government to repair the wrong done the Poncas. It says:

> We should be more prompt and anxious because they are weak and we are strong. In my judgment we should be liberal to the verge of lavishness in the expenditure of our money to improve their condition, so that they and all others may know that, although like all nations and all men we may do wrong, we are willing to make ample reparation.

The report of the commission appointed by me, of which General Crook was chairman, and the testimony taken by them and their investigations add very little to what was already contained in the official reports of the Secretary of the Interior and the report of the Senate committee touching the injustice done to the Poncas by their removal to the Indian Territory. Happily, however, the evidence reported by the commission and their recommendations point out conclusively the true measures of redress which the Government of the United States ought now to adopt.

The commission in its conclusions omit to state the important facts as to the present condition of the Poncas in the Indian Territory, but the evidence they have reported shows clearly and conclusively that the Poncas now residing in that Territory, five hundred and twenty-one in number, are satisfied with their new homes; that they are healthy, comfortable, and contented, and that they have freely and firmly decided to adhere to the choice announced in their letter of October 25, 1880, and in the declaration of December 27, 1880, to remain in the Indian Territory and not to return to Dakota.

The evidence reported also shows that the fragment of the Ponca tribe—perhaps one hundred and fifty in number—which is still in Dakota and Nebraska prefer to remain on their old reservation.

In view of these facts I am convinced that the recommendations of the commission together with the declaration of the chiefs of December last, if substantially followed, will afford a solution of the Ponca question which is consistent with the wishes and interests of both branches of the tribe, with the settled Indian policy of the Government, and as nearly as is now practicable with the demands of justice.

Our general Indian policy for the future should embrace the following leading ideas:

1. The Indians should be prepared for citizenship by giving to their young of both sexes that industrial and general education which is required to enable them to be self-supporting and capable of self-protection in a civilized community.

2. Lands should be allotted to the Indians in severalty, inalienable for a certain period.

3. The Indians should have a fair compensation for their lands not required for individual allotments, the amount to be invested with suitable safeguards for their benefit.

4. With these prerequisites secured the Indians should be made citizens and invested with the rights and charged with the responsibilities of citizenship.

It is therefore recommended that legislation be adopted in relation to the Ponca Indians, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to secure to the individual members of the Ponca tribe, in severalty, sufficient land for their support inalienable for a term of years and until the restriction upon alienation may be removed by the President. Ample time and opportunity should be given to the members of the tribe freely to choose their allotments either on their old or their new reservation.

Full compensation should be made for the lands to be relinquished, for their losses by the Sioux depredations and by reason of their removal to the Indian Territory—the amount not to be less than the sums named in the declaration of the chiefs made December 27, 1880.

In short nothing should be left undone to show to the Indians that the Government of the United States regards their rights as equally sacred with those of its citizens. The time has come when the policy should be to place the Indians as rapidly as practicable on the same footing with the other permanent inhabitants of our country.

I do not undertake to apportion the blame for the injustice done to the Poncas. Whether the Executive or Congress or the public is chiefly in fault is not now a question of practical importance. As the chief Executive at the time when the wrong was consummated, I am deeply sensible that enough of the responsibility for that wrong justly attaches to me to make it my particular duty and earnest desire to do all I can to give to these injured people that measure of redress which is required alike by justice and by humanity.

RUTHERFORD B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 1, 1881.

NOTE.—The accompanying papers herein referred to are this day transmitted with the message to the Senate.

Mr. SCALES. I move that the message and the accompanying papers when received be printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I ask also that the message be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. It will be printed in the RECORD, having been read; and it goes into the Journal as well.

POTTAWATOMIE CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in reply to a resolution of the House in relation to Pottawatomie claims.

Mr. SCALES. I move that the communication and the accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBB. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the District appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] desires to ask the House at this time to pass the post-route bill.

Mr. COBB. I will yield with the understanding that I will be recognized for the motion I have indicated after the gentleman from Mississippi gets through.

POST-ROUTES.

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, under instructions from that committee, the post-route bill with amendments for consideration and passage at this time. I move to dispense with the reading. There is no legislation in it except the establishment of post-routes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is that the printed bill?

Mr. MONEY. It is the printed bill with amendments.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes, with amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MONEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DUTIES ON MANUFACTURES OF IRON, ETC.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 7100) in relation to the duties on manufactures of iron, &c.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

RIGHT OF SENATE TO ORIGINATE APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on the Judiciary in relation to the bill (S. No. 1157) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase additional lots of ground adjoining the new building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. I ask that the report of the committee, together with the views of the minority, be printed and recommitted.

The SPEAKER. This is a report touching the right of the Senate to originate appropriation bills. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary asks that the report of the committee, together with the views of the minority and the accompanying papers, be printed and recommitted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent that two hours be assigned on Monday next for the consideration of the report of the Select Committee on the Interoceanic Ship Canal, touching the Monroe doctrine.

The SPEAKER. Monday morning cannot be interfered with, that being the day when individuals can move to suspend the rules.

Mr. KING. Then I ask that the two hours be assigned for this purpose on Tuesday next.

Mr. KEIFER. In what form does this come up?

Mr. KING. It is a report from the Committee on the Interoceanic Ship Canal.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. KEIFER. In what form does it come? Is it merely for discussion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised. He supposes it is for consideration and discussion. Is there objection?

Mr. COFFROTH, Mr. KEIFER, and others objected.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COBB. I renew the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. CONVERSE in the chair,) and proceeded with the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes. When the committee rose yesterday it was dividing upon an amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out the following:

For buildings for schools: For the purchase, when necessary, and the erection and completion of three buildings for primary and intermediate schools, two to be erected in the second school division and one in the sixth school division, (county,) $100,000, provided that they shall be contracted for before the 1st day of September next, and finished before the 1st day of August, 1882, to be appropriated as follows, namely: For the second school division, $96,000; for the sixth school division, (county,) $4,000.

For the payment of the Washington school-fund bonds now held by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, $70,630.47; and said commissioners are hereby authorized and directed to cancel and destroy said bonds, and to use said appropriation in the erection and completion of a high-school building. Said building shall be located on that part of square numbered 446 commencing at the rear end of that part of said square heretofore dedicated to school purposes, two hundred feet in width, thence south same width to O street, in Washington City; and said building shall be contracted for and completed within the time fixed for the buildings provided for in the next preceding paragraph: And provided, That the plans and specifications for each of said school buildings shall be furnished by the architect of the Capitol and approved by the board of school trustees, and the work shall be superintended by the District inspector of buildings.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

And the commissioners are hereby authorized to sell the 3.65 bonds which are held by them in trust as a school fund, amounting to $70,630.47, and apply the proceeds to the erection of two school buildings on sites and according to plans approved by the board of school trustees. Said plans to be furnished and the work to be superintended by the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the proposed amendment.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 44, noes 71.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. HUNTON said: I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HUNTON, and Mr. ALDRICH of Rhode Island, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 52, noes 96.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SAMFORD. I move to amend the paragraph in relation to a high-school building by striking out the words "that part of square numbered 446, commencing at the rear end of that part of said square heretofore dedicated to school purposes, two hundred feet in width, thence south same width to O street, in Washington City," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "such site as the commissioners for the District shall select."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment to the text of the bill just preceding the portion which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] proposes to amend.

The CHAIRMAN. By consent these two paragraphs of the bill are now being considered together.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And it will be in order for me to offer my amendment when the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama shall have been disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. It will.

Mr. NEAL. I make the point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama that the Committee of the Whole has just refused to strike out all the words that are included in his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the Committee of the Whole refused to strike out the entire paragraphs. The proposed amendment is to strike out a portion of one of the paragraphs, and the Chair is of opinion that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. SAMFORD. Not only does my amendment propose to strike out but a portion of this paragraph, but it proposes to insert that which, in my judgment, will be for the improvement of the rest of the paragraph.

I desire to be distinctly understood as not being opposed to either a high school or to the public schools in this District or in any other section of the country. In my judgment, the time is very near at hand when the main-stay of the popular liberties of this country will be found in the education of its citizens.

I will not now undertake to repeat the arguments made yesterday, because they seem to me to have been exhausted. My amendment still allows the high-school and the common-school buildings provided for by this bill. All it seeks to do is to leave it to the discretion of the commissioners of the District to determine where the high-school building shall be located. I do it in the line of the argument made on yesterday in behalf of the citizens of that portion of this District who desire a market-house on this square.

If my amendment shall be voted down, (which I am free to say I anticipate,) I shall offer no other amendment to this paragraph, judging that the temper of the House is opposed to devoting this square to any other purpose than that contemplated by the Committee on Appropriations reporting this bill.

Mr. COBB. I desire to say but a single word. I submit to this committee that the location provided in this bill for the high-school building is a proper one and in the line of economy. We own the ground, and there is a school building already located there on the ground. As I said yesterday, and as I now repeat, it is proposed to locate a market on the south part of this lot, adjoining the portion on which a public-school building is already located, and one or the other must sooner or later give way, for the two are inconsistent with each other.

Mr. SAMFORD. I do not propose by my amendment to locate a market anywhere. I propose to leave to the discretion of the commissioners of the District where the high-school building shall be located.

Mr. COBB. I understand the proposition of the gentleman. The main fight has been made against this paragraph by those who propose that this lot shall be occupied by a market building instead of a school-house. I submit that it is due to the school interests of this growing city and of the country that this high school shall be located upon this lot rather than a market house, for the reason, as I have already said, that the two are inconsistent, and there is a school building there now.

Now, if we locate a market house upon this square, (which the pending amendment is intended to leave an open question,) we will thereby destroy the usefulness of the school-house already located there, and which has been located there by direction of the commissioners of the District.

This is a matter which we ought to control; it is now within our grasp, and it is our duty to ourselves and to this community not to allow a market house to go upon square 446. As I have heretofore said, there is now a market house southeast of this square, distant a little less than three squares, and another market house a little less than three squares northwest of the site on which it is proposed to erect another market house. I say, then, that we ought to stand by the position we have assumed; we ought to carry through this provision of the bill, and do justice to the children of this District and the parents who have children to send to the public schools. The proposition urged in opposition to the provision of this bill is, I believe, a blow at the public schools, and nothing else. I do not believe it is so intended by the gentleman from Alabama, but that is decidedly the effect of his proposition.

Mr. KLOTZ. Mr. Chairman, the whole House knows that I hardly ever occupy its time; for speech-making is not in my line; but I cannot sit here in silence and hear assertions made from such apparently high authority when the parties themselves know the facts are otherwise. I cannot sit silently by and see an effort made by a combination of Shylocks to ruin other people and enhance the value of their own property. I am hurt to think that party lines have to be drawn on a question of education or a question of private right—a question which should be decided by the purest principles of equity, not influenced by considerations of avarice urged by those who are undertaking to advance their own fortunes. I hope that we shall cease to draw party lines on a question like this, and vote for justice and right.

In the first place, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] urges that there is a school-house erected on this square, and if a market is put there the school-house must be removed. Let me state that there has been a market on this square for seven years or more, and the school-house which is spoken of is not half finished. The proposition really is to drive away the market for the benefit of the school, not to drive away the school for the benefit of the market.

Seven or eight years ago this square was purchased for the erection of a market. This is the statement made to us by the commissioners. Work was commenced upon the foundations of a market house. The distance is half a mile from the center of this proposed market house to the other market house which is spoken of, the market house on K street. The latter market house has no railroad nearer than a square and a half. This square has street railways on three sides, affording easy communication with any part of the city. This location is already occupied for market purposes by one hundred farmers. There are one hundred and fifty stalls there, which have been occupied for seven years. People from the whole surrounding country come to this place to sell their produce and supply the needs of the public. If a market house be placed on this square, persons can step from the cars directly into the market house and from the market house back into the cars, with their heavy baskets, instead of paying ten or fifteen cents to have their baskets carried a square and a half. This market-house site is on Seventh street, between O and P. The nearest existing market house is on K street, between Fourth and Fifth. It is a distance of half a mile by actual measurement from the center of this proposed market house to the one already erected. A market has already been established on this square.

I will tell you the whole trouble. The K street market was built in a place not accessible by cars, and consequently the investors did not find it profitable. The property was mortgaged; the stock went down to a nominal value. The people controlling one of the national banks of this city bought up this stock at twenty cents on the dollar. Mr. Temple, who is the heir to this property, was last year made one of the school trustees, for the purpose of monopolizing this square and driving away the people who are now using it for market purposes. The object is in this way to enhance the value of the K street market property and its stock. I say that the commissioner who has charge of the schools appointed Mr. Temple one of the trustees; and this is the reason why that commissioner and this trustee work in harmony for the purpose of doing away with the market on this square. A number of persons, many of them Germans, have bought property in the vicinity of this square because of a market being located there, and for seven years have been paying taxes at enhanced assessments because of the dedication of this square to market purposes. But these rich Shylocks are determined that there shall not be a market house there.

Mr. COFFROTH obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. KLOTZ.

Mr. KLOTZ. As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, when the market was started on this square a great many persons, a majority of them Germans, settled around there, opened their shops and built one very large hotel, called the Farmers' Hotel, for the accommodation of farmers. Fifty thousand dollars or more has been spent in this way on real estate. These people have their stores, their shops, their saloons if you please. Now it is said we ought not to have a market there, because it will bring these stores, shops, and hotels in front of the school-house. I say that these places were established there seven years ago; and now because these other people cannot come in and get the property at half price, thereby lining their pockets, they want to wipe out this market; they want to throw the trade to the K street market, thus enhancing the value of the stock of that concern, which is held by them.

I repeat, it is an outrage that party lines should be drawn on a question of this kind. I repeat that by actual measurement it is a distance of half a mile from the center of one market to the other. I repeat that a market was established on this square seven years before the school-house was commenced. That school building was begun only last summer.

Why cannot the high school be built on one side of this square, which is three hundred feet long? The proposition is that the school-house shall stand on the north side of the square in the middle of it, and this market building on the south side of the square in the middle, exactly where this German market now stands, where the market people now come from ten or fifteen miles around the city, where this hotel has been erected for the accommodation of the farmers. This market has paid more money to the Government for the last five years than any corporate market in the District of Columbia. I do hope that the pending provision of this bill will not be adopted.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, if we were ignorant before of the power that is standing behind and urging the striking out of this provision in the bill certainly the frankness of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has removed any such ignorance on our part. It is the market-men who have possession of Government property and who desire to retain possession of it to the exclusion of every beneficial interest which is here advocating the use of this property for a purpose from which it ought not to be diverted to any other.

Who, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, are the Shylocks? Who are the men who have come and besieged the room of the Committee on the District of Columbia and the Halls of Congress, urging that this property shall be disposed of in the manner he suggests? Whose interests and claims does he advocate upon this floor? I say to this House there is not a single person, so far as my knowledge goes, who ever came before our committee except in open session to ask us to make any disposition of this property whatever. When the question came before the committee in a proper and legitimate way, then we heard all sides, and the majority of the Committee on the District of Columbia resolved that the market house should not be established in this place.

Let me state another fact. When these parties took possession of that square they leased it for a period of two years. They have held possession of it ever since without any renewal of that lease. That is all the claim they have upon it. At most, they are mere tenants at will. You may call them squatters unlawfully in the possession of that property.

I said yesterday that the question which addresses itself to the consideration of this committee is, whether or not we shall use this property eligibly situated for the purpose of the location of this high-school building, or whether we shall allow it to be occupied by these men and compel the school board to go elsewhere, condemn property and pay for the improvements already erected, and put this building there? It seems to me there can be but one answer to this question.

Mr. KLOTZ. Is this the only place in the District of Columbia where a high-school building can be erected?

Mr. NEAL. No; and it is not the only place in the District of Columbia where we can establish a market house.

Mr. KLOTZ. But the market house is there now.

Mr. NEAL. Yes; the market house is there now in the hands of squatters who have no more right than you or I have to that place.

Mr. KLOTZ. They have paid the Government dues for seven years.

Mr. NEAL. I do not care what they have paid to the Government; they have no rights there which this House or anybody else is bound to respect.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, there should be but one opinion in this House on this subject, unless there are gentlemen upon this floor who have the Bourbonism of that class referred to by an old gentleman in my own town, "who did not want their children to know more than themselves, and who," he added, "could not know a damn sight less." [Laughter.]

Mr. HENKLE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. COFFROTH'S amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENKLE. Is it in order to make a remark?

The CHAIRMAN. Not unless the gentleman moves an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HENKLE. Very well, then I will move to strike out the last two words. Although I have no desire to have the last word on this question, nevertheless I do wish to make a remark in regard to this high-school question. It is a settled matter that we are to have a high school in this District. We cordially indorse that, and will support it if there is an appropriation for it. This amendment provides the commissioners, in their judgment, shall locate it in the best position. This bill selects and locates it upon this market-house site. I think it is reasonable to infer the commissioners of the District have a knowledge of the necessities of the District as well as the gentleman who has reported this bill.

I want to say here now it is a question of importance, and you ought to think of it dispassionately and keep in sight the welfare of the rising generation of this town. I do say here earnestly, candidly, and dispassionately, without having one farthing of interest one way or the other, that the location in this bill is not a central one. The streets in Washington are named alphabetically, commencing at A and running down to the last letter in the alphabet. This is out upon O street, and you may form some idea from that fact whether it is in a central position or not. It is out on O street, which is on the northern border of the city, and upon the site selected for a market-house to accommodate that particular section of the city. O street northwest is not the central portion of the city. It is far remote from South Washington in the neighborhood of the arsenal and from the eastern branch of the Potomac. It is remote from the navy-yard and that part of the city lying east of the Capitol, a large and populous section of the city. In this section live the poor people who are to be benefited by public education, for whose benefit the system of public education has been established and paid for. Therefore I beseech you to think of the interest of these people and do not establish this school-house in an aristocratic section of the city and remote from the poor people for whom the system of public education was established.

Mr. COBB. I dislike, Mr. Chairman, to detain the House further on this subject of a high school. The school board of this District, composed of nineteen members, unanimously favored the erection of this high-school building upon the site upon which this bill locates it. They have been before the committee and we have heard their suggestions on this subject. When the gentleman from Maryland undertakes to say that this is not a central location he is just mistaken, and that is all about it.

Mr. HENKLE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COBB. I did not interrupt the gentleman, and I hope he will not interrupt me.

Taking the east and the west this is as nearly a central location as any that could possibly be selected in this city, and it is nearly a central location north and south. The city, as is well known, is growing in the northern and northwestern direction. Now, the school board are unanimously in favor of locating it here, and the necessities of instruction here of this character demand the erection of this building in some such point which has the sanction of the school board. This board is exceedingly anxious to establish it at this point. No place, according to their judgment, is so well adapted for a public school of this kind as this.

Now, I do not desire to take up the time of the committee any further with discussing this matter, and I hope it will come to a vote upon it.

Mr. HENKLE. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Alabama.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 80.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COBB. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will give way a moment, so as to allow me to ask to have two words inserted in the first line of this paragraph, which seem to be omitted from the bill. In the bill as printed the words "of sites," after the word "purchase," in line 471, should be inserted so that it will read, "for the purchase of sites when necessary," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. Chairman, I now move to strike out the first paragraph of this section. It will be observed that there are two paragraphs under consideration in this section. The first, beginning on line 471 and ending at line 480, I move to strike out.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, I must raise the question of order upon that amendment. The committee has passed that point.

Mr. HUNTON. Oh, no! The gentleman will remember that these two paragraphs are considered as one.

Mr. COBB. I do not understand that we are considering this section in connection with the next one beginning at line 481.

The CHAIRMAN. That was an agreement made on yesterday in committee, to consider both of these together.

Mr. COBB. Very well.

Mr. HUNTON. Provision is sought to be made here for the erection of school buildings and the purchase of sites, in this city. I regret to take up the time of the committee with further amendments, but I believe that it is proper that I should press to a vote the amendment which I now offer. As the bill stands, there is appropriated for the purpose of school buildings in the District of Columbia the sum of five hundred and seventy-odd thousand dollars. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates for the same purpose in the next fiscal year $422,000, so that it is an increase over the estimates of the Secretary of somewhere in the neighborhood of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to one hundred and seventy thousand dollars. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it is more than can be properly appropriated in one year for purposes of schools in this district.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUNTON. I have only five minutes, and hope the gentleman will not interrupt me at this time.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that this is a larger sum than can be afforded by the revenues of the District in any one year; and while I would not limit the educational advantages to be afforded to the children of this city and of Georgetown, yet I believe that it is to the interest of the District not to appropriate so large an amount during the present year for this particular purpose. I do not believe, sir, that that amount of money can be expended wisely at this time in building school-houses. If my amendment prevails to strike out this paragraph, the only effect on the bill that would result from it would be to limit the building of school-houses to one high school already provided for in the next paragraph and postpone for the present the building of the common-school houses provided for in this paragraph. It is in the interest of the people of this District that the building of the three school-houses provided for here shall be postponed for the present and that we continue to rent, as we are now doing, for a short time longer. And I desire to say further that the committee have already adopted the amendment appropriating $300,000 for the purpose of replacing the rotten wooden pavements; and I apprehend, gravely apprehend, that if one hundred thousand is appropriated for the building of school-houses in addition to the $70,000 already passed upon by the committee for the purpose of building a high school there will not be money enough out of the current revenues of the District to pay the $300,000 for replacing these pavements. Therefore I ask the committee to postpone for this year the building of these school-houses and continue the renting of rooms as at present only for a little time. There are now in process of erection two new buildings for school purposes, which will be completed and ready for occupancy by the end of the fiscal year; so that when next year comes there will be twenty-four additional school-rooms in the city of Washington, which I apprehend will meet all reasonable demands in that direction; and it strikes me for the present that the bill should be confined to this high-school building and limited in other respects as I have suggested.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire briefly to call the attention of the committee to the appropriations made last year for the District of Columbia. The gentleman from Virginia objects to this appropriation, but he will, it seems to me, concede that the amount can be paid by the District of Columbia by a comparison with the amounts paid in a former year. The amount appropriated for 1881 was in round numbers $3,425,000. It is proposed here to appropriate only some three million two hundred and seventy-three thousand dollars, including the amount necessary for the erection of these school-houses. The gentleman says that the appropriation for the repair of the roads and streets amounts to $150,000 more than the amount set apart in the bill, having been increased to that extent. That is true; that has been increased by the amendment of the committee, but I submit to the committee whether it is better for the schools to fail or the roads to fail. It seems to me if there is anything to fail it should not be the schools. Again, the taxes of course, as every gentleman must know, are constantly increasing. Now, the taxes to be applied to the purposes of this bill are the taxes to be collected in 1882, not in 1881, and it seems to me that no reasonable fear need be felt that the revenues of the District will be insufficient for this purpose; that is, to build the school-houses as well as to repair the roads.

It seems to me there can be no reasonable fear but the appropriation will be sufficient for both purposes, to build the school-houses and to repair the streets, which, to be sure, are in bad condition, but not in so bad a condition as the schools are. A large number of the schools are located in basements of churches and all sorts of out-of-the-way buildings, where children are suffering and to which parents are not willing to send their children.

Mr. COBB. We have now the issue made, and it is presented squarely. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] in his amendment now proposes to strike out two school-houses which are proposed in this bill to be built. He claims that the revenue of the District will perhaps not be able to bear the burden of erecting these two school-houses thus provided for. He gives that as a reason why his amendment should be adopted and that portion of the bill stricken out which provides for the erection of these buildings.

Now, when the gentleman from Virginia was proposing his amendment of $150,000 for the repair and repaving of streets, &c., he presented an estimate by Major Twining, as he said, which will make the revenues amount to about three million six hundred thousand dollars. He now says the revenues will not be sufficient when it comes to building school-houses. If Major Twining is right and if the gentleman from Virginia is right in his quotation from him—and I have the same figures—why, then there will be enough. I did not favor the gentleman's amendment, because I was in favor of fostering the revenues of the District as best I could, giving them such direction as would most benefit the people of the District and save the revenues in the end.

I have before me a map showing where school-houses are located in the locality where we propose to put these two buildings. As I have already stated, the rents amount to nearly eight thousand dollars a year. There are seven school-rooms in this school division that are not fit to-day for the children to go to. They are unhealthy and illy ventilated. There i s not a school building in my State that is as bad as those seven rooms. There is not a school building out of the more than nine thousand in my State which is as bad as seven of these buildings. And, as I have said, we are paying as much as 10 per cent. on the full and complete value of the entire property by way of rents for these rooms. In addition to that we are spending $15,000 a year on repairs, a part of which goes to repair these buildings.

The gentlemen from Virginia has made the issue. It is whether we shall have common schools in this District or not. That is the question we have been fighting on for nearly two days, and the issue is presented squarely at last. Will you build the school-houses or not? If this committee determines we ought not to build, at least I have done my duty. I am for it heart and soul, and regret my friends on this side do not more generally stand by me.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to strike out the last word. I do not desire to detain the committee, and shall only do so for a moment. I am the last man to make the issue on free schools.

Mr. COBB. You are doing it now.

Mr. HUNTON. The gentleman will excuse me; I am not doing that now. The only question is, how we shall accommodate the scholars; whether we shall rent or build school-houses.

As regards the estimates, I am not inconsistent now with the position I took in the early part of the consideration of the bill. The estimates of Major Twining, alluded to by the gentleman from Indiana, will not bring the receipts of the District up to the expenditures of the bill if $170,000 are appropriated for building school buildings. I will give you the figures. Major Twining estimates the receipts of the next fiscal year at $1,698,000, with a surplus added of $21,000 from the current fiscal year. That will bring into the treasury $3,394,000. The amount of this bill as originally reported was $3,272,994. Take that sum from the estimated receipts and there are left $121,000. But the amount added to the bill for the purposes of relaying the rotten pavements of the streets is $150,000; and it is evident the $121,000 would not pay the $150,000. And I submit, Mr. Chairman, it is a much more important thing to have these rotten wooden pavements taken up and to preserve the health of the children and the adults than it is to build fine school-houses for the present accommodation of the children.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUNTON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. If it is so very important for the health of the District that these rotten wooden pavements should be replaced—and I agree to a considerable extent in what the gentleman from Virginia has said as to that—why have not the commissioners expended the money appropriated by Congress for that purpose? Why is there an unexpended balance of $419,000 in the treasury to-day?

Mr. HUNTON. There is not that much by a long way belonging to the replacing of pavements.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. That was the statement that was made the day before yesterday.

Mr. HUNTON. I have the statement of Major Twining, which shows that there are some three hundred thousand dollars to the credit of that fund; and I beg to state that contracts are made now to be executed by the 1st July that will consume that fund.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And there will be nothing left?

Mr. HUNTON. No; there will be nothing left. I am so informed by the engineer commissioner, that the contracts made and suspended now in consequence of the extreme cold weather, to be completed by the 1st July, will spend every dollar of this balance in the treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I hope so.

Mr. HUNTON. I hope this amendment will prevail.

The question being taken on Mr. HUNTON'S amendment it was not agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "three," on line 472, and insert "two."
Strike out "two," on line 473, and insert "one."
Strike out "one hundred," on line 475, and insert "fifty."
Strike out "ninety-six," on line 479, and insert "forty-six."
Strike out all from line 481 to 498 inclusive, so that it will read:
"For buildings for schools: For the purchase of sites, when necessary, and the erection and completion of two buildings for primary and intermediate schools, one to be erected in the second school division and one in the sixth school division, (county,) $50,000, provided that they shall be contracted for before the 1st day of September next, and finished before the 1st day of August, 1882, to be appropriated as follows, namely: For the second school division, $46,000; for the sixth school division, (county,) $4,000."

Mr. COBB. I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What is the point of order?

Mr. COBB. My point of order is that the committee has already passed upon this matter, at least so far as striking out the second paragraph is concerned, and I hold that if my point of order is good against one portion of the amendment it is good against all of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is mistaken in his point of order. By general consent the two paragraphs are being considered together.

Mr. HUNTON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that the Committee of the Whole is unquestionably in favor of retaining the second paragraph. I would therefore recommend to him to omit from his amendment the portion relating to the second paragraph.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will adopt the suggestion of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON.]

I have said nothing thus far in regard to this bill, and I would not now say anything if I did not feel it my duty to speak for those whom I represent on this floor and to say a word for those who are not represented on this floor. We are legislating here as the British Parliament legislated a little over one hundred years ago for the American colonies; we are imposing taxation without representation. And when it is remembered that our forefathers testified their abhorrence of that principle on many a bloody battle-field, it should at least serve to admonish us to be very careful about imposing taxation without representation.

There are in this District nearly two hundred thousand people who have no representation on this floor. While the head of each Executive Department of this Government has access to this Hall and can consult with members on matters relating to the Departments no one representing these 200,000 people can obtain admission through the doors of this Hall in order to consult with the members here when legislation is under consideration affecting the interests of the people of this District.

What do you propose to do by this bill, or rather by the portion to which my amendment relates? You propose to impose a tax of $160,000 for building new school-houses. Are they needed in this District? If you will consult most of those who ought I think know more about that question than any of us here, they will tell you that they are not needed.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Not now; I have but five minutes. I desire to call the attention of members to the fact that thus far the commissioners of this District have not recommended the construction of one of these additional school-houses, and neither has it been recommended by the Committee on the District of Columbia of this House.

Some one in this debate has remarked rather flippantly that it is not necessary to consult the District commissioners. Why not? Can any one here cast any imputation upon their integrity or upon their good judgment? My friend from Indiana [Mr. COBB] has testified truthfully with regard to one of the commissioners. I happen to know them all, and I know them to be good and worthy citizens, and I believe they are judicious and faithful officers deserving of consideration and consultation. They have given a good administration of the affairs of the District and have reduced expenditures, notwithstanding the increase of population since they came into office in July, 1878.

What do those commissioners say? They say it is more important to the health, comfort, and the welfare of the people of this District that the old rotten pavements, many of which were put down under fraudulent contracts, before they came into office, should be replaced with good and substantial paving. The engineer commissioner of the District, in whom my friend from Indiana [Mr. COBB] has confidence as to his judgment upon this question, has said that it is important that these rotten pavements should be replaced. He expresses the sentiment of all those who understand their condition.

I want to call attention to what has been said by an ably edited and popular journal of this District upon this very question, and which ought to receive some attention from members of this House. I hold in my hand an article from the Evening Star of this city. The editor of that paper has been known to me for many years, and I know his statements are worthy of credit. He is a son of Maine, a State of steady habits, of good school-houses, and of an excellent common-school system. I ask the Clerk to read the portion of that article which I have marked bearing directly on this question, and which I believe expresses the sentiments of a very large majority of the tax-payers of this District.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the same time that these sweeping reductions were made in the appropriations for work so largely affecting the public comfort, health, and convenience, the bill takes the large sum of $210,630 from the general revenues of the District for the erection of school buildings, not for general school purposes, but for school buildings alone. And this large amount is appropriated almost entirely for three buildings, whereas it should suffice for the erection of a dozen school-houses of reasonable size, and placed at points most convenient for the use of the greatest number of pupils. But much as school buildings are needed, this is altogether too large a sum to be drawn from the District revenues in a single year for buildings alone, especially as the burden of general school expenses is exceptionally large in Washington. Further, the commissioners are required to place one of these buildings on the site of the present O street market, whereby the city will lose about six thousand dollars revenue. For some reason, not apparent upon the face, it is provided that the plans and specifications for these school buildings shall be furnished by the Architect of the Capitol, although the District has competent architects in its employ for that very service.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How many school buildings are there in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia to-day? Does any one know? I am informed that there are two hundred and twenty-four school buildings owned by the District of Columbia. I venture the assertion that there are more school-houses in the District of Columbia to-day than there are in any other city on earth of equal population.

Mr. COBB. I know that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] does not desire to misrepresent. The number he states includes the rooms also rented for school purposes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from Indiana is mistaken. I have here a statement obtained from what I regard as reliable authority, from one of the officials of the District government.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. A question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have not time.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Then I call the gentleman to order; he has spoken five minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I find that there are two hundred and twenty-four school buildings owned by this city. I asked the question particularly, and was told that that number did not embrace any rented school-houses whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I thank my friend from Virginia for his courtesy.

I am the last person on this floor who would oppose the construction of any school-house where it is needed in all this broad land. A portion of the education of my early boyhood I owe to the common schools of the District of Columbia, and I believe I know something about them. And I think I am warranted in saying that my knowledge of the public-school system of the State of Illinois is perhaps equal to that of almost any other citizen of that State. While I regard the public-school system of Illinois as exceptionally good, I am convinced from the examination I have given the subject that in the city of Washington there is as good if not the best common-school system, the best common schools, and the best methods of primary instruction that can be found in any other city or State in this Union.

Why, sir, some Cabinet officers, Senators, members of Congress, and many of the wealthiest citizens of this District have had their children partly educated in the common schools of this District. I submit, therefore, that the common-school system and facilities of this District are good enough. But I come back to the question, is there a necessity for an increased number of school buildings? It may be that the constant increase of population will render it important that provision should be made for an increased number of school buildings. Therefore I propose as a compromise measure on this subject the amendment I have offered. I propose in this amendment that two of the three common-school houses recommended by the Committee on Appropriations shall be constructed—one in the county and one in the very division spoken of by the gentleman from Indiana, where it is said the school buildings are insufficient and unfit to accommodate the scholars. This amendment will save an expenditure of $46,000, which I think ought to be used in replacing these rotten, malaria-generating, death-breeding pavements of this city.

I am satisfied from articles in the press of this city and from my conversations with prominent citizens that if we can progress with the building of school-houses at the rate of one building a year, we shall progress as rapidly as the interests of education and of the tax-payers of this District as well as the tax-payers throughout the country would require or warrant. Bear in mind, gentlemen, that you are not only imposing taxes upon the people of this District, but also upon your own people in your own States. Unless you can show a necessity for these taxes they should not be laid. In the State of Illinois (and my State stands almost at the head of the column in respect to education) I do not believe there is a city or a district where you will find more ample and valuable common-school facilities than in this District. Therefore I am opposed to an increase of the burden of taxation on my own people or the tax-payers of the District, when I feel that such a burden will be unnecessary.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last word. Mr. Chairman, a single fact will upset the fervid argument of my friend from Illinois. This fact is that in addition to all the school-houses in this city we are paying $30,000 annually as rent for insufficient, inconvenient, poorly-ventilated, and unhealthy school accommodations. Thirty thousand dollars is the interest at 5 per cent. on $600,000. If we appropriate $200,000 in this bill for school buildings we save $30,000 a year. Now, I say that this District ought to have school accommodations enough; and we ought not to be paying $30,000 a year as rent for the miserable places which are rented in this city for school purposes.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. As an indication of the value of the statistics given by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSHEND,] I want to say that according to the report of the board of school trustees for the present year there were two hundred and thirty-eight school-rooms occupied in this District.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will my friend allow me a moment? I will not vouch for the accuracy of my statement in regard to school buildings. This morning when I asked well-informed officials the number of school buildings in the District, I was told there were two hundred and twenty-four. I am willing to concede that perhaps I misunderstood my informant; he may have intended to say school-rooms, instead of school buildings.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I have no doubt that much of the information the gentleman has given is quite as accurate as that to which he has alluded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That is the only information I have given.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. There is no reason why we should not make this appropriation for school-houses as reported by the committee, and also the appropriation for pavements as already agreed to. The revenues of the District will be ample for both purposes. This Committee of the Whole has expressed its opinion three, four, or five times already on every question now submitted by the gentleman from Illinois; and I believe there is no occasion for further discussion. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I wish to say only a word in reply to my friend from Rhode Island. It is possible that I may have been misinformed as to the number of school buildings in the District, but still the point to which I wish to draw the attention of the House is that this amendment provides for two of the three school buildings which the Committee on Appropriations recommend, and in view of what I have already said, should be accepted as a compromise.

Mr. BRIGGS. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Illinois has already occupied ten minutes on the discussion of this very question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last two words. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, the amendment I propose will furnish all the new buildings that the city needs for school purposes, and if adopted it will avoid the necessity for creating a deficiency; for having increased to $300,000 the appropriation for the improvement of streets, if you adopt this bill as it now stands, there is danger that a deficiency will occur at the end of the next fiscal year. But if my amendment be adopted, all needed funds will be afforded for the improvement of streets and for all school buildings really needed at the present time. I hope that, as a compromise measure, this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. NEAL. Let me correct the gentleman from Illinois. If the House should agree to all that the Committee of the Whole has done on this bill and should leave unchanged this provision for school-houses, the appropriations will be no larger than we made last year, while the revenues we may reasonably hope will largely increase.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I withdraw the formal amendment to the amendment.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

For one health officer, $3,000; six sanitary inspectors, at $1,200 each; one food-inspector, $1,200; one inspector of marine products, $1,000; for clerks, $7,000; one messenger, $540; one pound-master, $1,000; and for contingent expenses, including books, stationery, fuel, rent, laborers under pound-master, repairs to pound, and wagon and horse for pound-master, forage, meat for dogs, disinfectants, horseshoeing, and miscellaneous items, $2,500; removal of garbage, $15,000; in all, $40,440.

Mr. PAGE. I move to amend, in line 523, by striking out "2,500" and inserting "3,800" as the appropriation for contingent expenses. Thirty-eight hundred dollars is the amount which was appropriated last year for contingent expenses of the health department; and I am informed that this amount is absolutely necessary for the proper conduct of this office. To reduce this amount about thirteen hundred dollars would seriously cripple that office. I think it poor economy to strike down appropriation for this the most important department in the city of Washington. To cut off $1,300 in the health department of this city, not only in my judgment, but in the judgment of those with whom I have conversed, would seriously cripple it. I hope the amount asked for this year, and which is the amount appropriated last year for this purpose, all of which was used legitimately, and $28 beside paid out of the pocket of the health officer himself—I hope the full amount will be granted to this health office.

I know but little personally of this health officer, but what I hear of him is much to his credit. I understand he is an energetic and able officer, and faithful in the discharge of all his duties. I do not regard it as good economy for this House or for the members who bring their families to Washington to reside for many months during the summer season to have this important branch of the city government crippled in any respect whatever. I believe the full amount asked for and the full amount appropriated and expended legitimately last year should be appropriated for the next fiscal year. I hope the gentleman from Indiana who has this matter in charge will place no obstacle in the way of giving this officer a sufficient amount for the honest and intelligent management of the health office over which he presides.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order would rule out this amendment if it had been made in time. Last year, when this bill was made up, I presume the attention of the Committee on Appropriations was not called to the general law on the subject. Now, that general law is as follows. I call the attention of the committee to it:

SEC. 8. That in lieu of the board of health now authorized by law, the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall appoint a physician as health officer, whose duty it shall be, under the direction of the said commissioners, to execute and enforce all laws and regulations relating to the public health and vital statistics, and to perform all such duties as may be assigned to him by said commissioners; and the board of health now existing shall, from the date of the appointment of said health officer, be abolished.

SEC. 9. That there may be appointed by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, on the recommendation of the health officer, a reasonable number of sanitary inspectors for said District, not exceeding six, to hold such appointment at any one time, of whom two may be physicians, and one shall be a person skilled in the matters of drainage and ventilation; and said commissioners may remove any of the subordinates, and from time to time may prescribe the duties of each; and said inspectors shall be respectively required to make, at least once in two weeks, a report to said health officer, in writing, of their inspections, which shall be preserved on file; and said health-officer shall report in writing annually to said commissioners of the District of Columbia, and so much oftener as they shall require.

SEC. 10. That the commissioners may appoint, on the like recommendation of the health officer, a reasonable number of clerks, but no greater number shall be appointed, and no more persons shall be employed under said health officer, than the public interests demand and the appropriation shall justify.

SEC. 11. That the salary of the health officer shall be $3,000 per annum; and the salary of the sanitary inspectors shall not exceed the sum of $1,200 per annum each; and the salary of the clerks and other assistants of the health officer shall not exceed in the aggregate the amount of $7,000, to be apportioned as the commissioners of the District of Columbia may deem best.

I have given the health officer more than the general law requires, and it is for this committee to determine whether or not he ought to have more than the bill provides. The amount appropriated last year exceeded the amount required because the attention of the Committee on Appropriations was not called to the general law. Mine certainly was not. This was a new bill; for the first time it was an appropriation bill for the District of Columbia made up and brought in separate and apart from any other appropriation bill. The law which I have read has governed me in regard to the appropriation for this health department, and the appropriations contained in this bill are in accordance with the statute.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to say one word in regard to this subject. I concur fully in what has been said by the gentleman from California in regard to this appropriation. The amount proposed by the gentleman from Indiana is not equal to what was appropriated last year for the same purpose. I do not understand the gentleman from Indiana denies that the amount proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from California is identically the same amount which was appropriated for the present fiscal year. The gentleman from Virginia also calls my attention to the fact that it is precisely the amount estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury for the next fiscal year. Therefore, unless the gentleman from Indiana can show some reason for changing the amount, unless he can show the amount appropriated last year was more than was necessary for this health department, then I think this committee ought to be reluctant to reduce that appropriation for the coming fiscal year.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, this is a matter of great importance. It has reference to the sanitary condition and health of this city. I understand the efficiency of this office, one of the most important in the District—important because it relates to the health of the people here—will be greatly interfered with if this amendment should not prevail.

Let me suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that the statute he has read is not in conflict with the amendment of the gentleman from California, nor is this amount in excess of what is required under that law.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, his Private Secretary.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HUNTON. I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the last word. Whatever I may say on the subject of general economy, I think it is penny-wise and pound-foolish to economize on the subject of health. If there is one thing deserving more attention than another, it is the care of the public health. We have at the head of the health department in this city a most excellent, accomplished, and efficient officer; and I say it is not prudent, it is not wise to cut down the estimates for that department, believed to be important and necessary not only by the health officer himself, but by the commissioners of the District and by the Secretary of the Treasury, who, I believe, has indorsed the estimates of the commissioners, which are identical with the appropriation for the present fiscal year.

The Committee on Appropriations have cut down this appropriation in many particulars, which I fear will cripple the efficiency of that department. There were two food-inspectors in the District of Columbia, and the committee have cut that down to one. I am informed by Dr. Townshend that it is impossible for one food-inspector to discharge the duties of that office.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like the gentleman from Virginia to state exactly the service the food-inspector is required to perform under the law.

Mr. HUNTON. The inspector of food in the cities of Washington and Georgetown is required to inspect all food sold in those cities. When it is remembered that we have thirteen markets, beside the private markets scattered over every portion of the city, some idea of the extent of the duties may be gathered. The food sold all over both cities has to be inspected by this inspector. It is utterly impossible for one man to perform that duty. It is as much as two men can perform.

Then, again, in reference to the inspector of marine products. There were two originally; now this appropriation proposes to cut it down to one. The duties of the inspector of marine products are such that one man cannot possibly perform them.

In regard to the pound-master. He received $1,200, and the committee have cut it down to $1,000. That pound-master cannot discharge his duties without having a buggy and horse to enable him to get around, and it was because of that fact that two years ago the Committee on Appropriations increased his salary from $1,000 to $1,200. Now the committee proposes to cut it down to $1,000 again. The committee also propose to cut down miscellaneous items from $3,860, the amount estimated, to $2,500.

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, an epidemic should break out in this city. The efforts of this department would be utterly powerless for the want of a few thousand dollars. Is that to be the case? Will this committee allow the people here to be subjected to the possibility of such a calamity? Will they allow this people to be placed in that condition when the health department of the District of Columbia, the commissioners, and the Secretary of the Treasury all say that this amount, $3,860, ought to be appropriated, instead of the amount proposed to be here given? I trust, Mr. Chairman, that whatever of economy the committee may choose to indulge in, that it will not be done at the expense of the health of the people of this District. I beg leave to have read in this connection a letter from the health officer upon this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to occupy the attention of the committee for a moment, and I will permit the paper which the gentleman refers to to be read in my time.

Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman from Indiana is the very best that could have been made to show why the committee should increase this appropriation to the amount asked for and to the amount appropriated last year. The only argument he gives is because, he says, that the general law prohibits it. But he goes on to state that last year, in the face of that general law, an appropriation bill was passed which supersedes the general law, and has been so decided, (and the point of order might have been raised against that proposition in this bill,) the effect of which was to increase the appropriation for that special department to a larger sum than he claims was authorized under the general law. Still it has not been denied that that amount was necessary for the proper execution of the duties of that office last year, and that fact is a sufficient argument that the same amount should be appropriated this year.

The gentleman from Indiana acknowledges that the committee exceeded the amount in their appropriations of last year in the face of that law, because of the fact that it was an absolute necessity.

Mr. COBB. Oh, no.

Mr. PAGE. It was asked for; it was estimated for in the estimates furnished the committee, and was appropriated by the committee. There must have been some reason why the committee should exceed the law, because, as the gentleman himself admits, they did exceed it. It is not to be supposed that the committee was ignorant of the law. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a fact that they did exceed the general law, and appropriated some thirty-eight hundred dollars for this service. We ask the same amount this year, because it has been shown in the management of this office during the last year that this sum of money is absolutely necessary for this purpose. I hope, sir, that the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy the attention of the committee but for a moment to read that portion of the general law which the gentleman from Indiana has referred to, and which I claim has no reference whatever to this appropriation, but only limits the pay of the assistants of the health officer. The law says:

> And the salary of the clerks and other assistants of the health officer shall not exceed in the aggregate the amount of $7,000, to be apportioned as the commissioners of the District of Columbia may deem best.

That is the language of the law. It has no reference whatever to the items of miscellaneous expenditures incorporated in this bill, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask now to have that paper read which I have sent to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the paper will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The reductions made in the estimates for maintenance of the health department are as follows:

|---|---|
| One food inspector | $1,200 |
| One inspector marine products | 1,000 |
| From salary of pound-master | 200 |
| From contingent expenses | 1,000 |

The removal of one food inspector leaves but one to prevent the sale of unwholesome food in this District. Only two have been allowed heretofore and the only work which could be accomplished was a supervision of the prominent sources of supply. With the District divided into two inspection districts and by constant unremitting labors these two officers have succeeded in doing valuable service, as is evidenced by the large amount of unsound and unwholesome meats, fruits, and vegetables condemned.

It would be impossible for one man to visit more than one-half of the markets alone in the District and inspect food on sale.

Therefore, to remove one, as proposed, would so seriously cripple the service as to render it practically valueless.

The salary of all inspectors should be uniform, I think, as their duties are about equal, both in importance and extent. The inspector of marine products should receive $1,200, as should the pound-master. The salary of the latter officer was fixed at that amount last year upon passage of the law extending the area for the taking up and impounding of domestic animals. He is a bonded officer and the duties are very onerous; the present incumbent has filled the position most acceptably for nearly eight years, and the strict performance of duties pertaining to his office has been the sole means of bringing in a revenue to the District of from $8,000 to $10,000 per annum.

The following statement will show, I think, that the estimate for contingent expenses was based upon a careful calculation as to the actual necessities of the service. The estimate was for $3,800, to include:

|---|---|
| Rent of office | $780 00 |
| Stationery | 500 00 |
| Blank forms and printing | 750 00 |
| Fuel | 140 00 |
| Forage for pound | 400 00 |
| Furniture | 100 00 |
| Harness, repairs, and blacksmithing | 150 00 |
| File cases | 150 00 |
| Rent of telephones | 117 00 |
| Total | 3,787 00 |

These amounts correspond to expenditures made last year, and the most rigid economy was necessary to get us through. It would be simply impossible for me to pay contingent expenses of this department from the sum of $2,500.

SMITH TOWNSHEND, M. D.,
Health Officer.

Mr. HUNTON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. COBB. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I do this to show to the committee that we did not arbitrarily strike down this department, and in order to establish that fact I wish to call the attention of the committee to the language of the Secretary of the Treasury himself. The gentleman from Virginia has stated that the estimates of the commissioners were indorsed by the Secretary of the Treasury. In that I think the gentleman is mistaken, as I will show. The Secretary says this; he estimates this department $3,860. He says:

> This item is $6,140 less than the amount of the commissioners' estimate. The reduction is made in order that the estimate for employés under the health officer may not exceed the amount which the act of June, 1878—

And which I read and to which the gentleman from Virginia has referred—> authorizes to be expended for that purpose. So long as this act remains in force this office cannot recommend the approval of any estimate for the employés under the health office which contemplates an expenditure in excess of the amount authorized thereby.

That is the language of the Secretary himself. Now, in regard to this health office, I want to say that I have given it some examination as best I could. Provision has been made for three food inspectors; and it is provided in this amendment here that two more shall be appointed, as I understand.

Mr. PAGE. No; my amendment provides that the sum of money shall be increased to $3,800.

Mr. COBB. I will state now that two food or four food inspectors cannot accomplish what seems to be contemplated to be done here.

Now, what can an inspector do? Why, he can inspect meats and vegetables. But how much can four inspectors in the summer season accomplish in the way of inspecting food further than what is brought in here in bulk? An inspector may inspect a mutton now, and in three hours it is spoiled and unfit for use. And it is the same with vegetables and marine products.

Mr. PAGE. My amendment has nothing to do with that.

Mr. COBB. I have looked into this matter and have found that the four food inspectors are unnecessary, and therefore we struck out three of them. I think, looking over the whole field, this department receives under this bill all that is necessary. I know it is claimed by the health officer that he ought to have more; but, in my judgment, from the best investigation I can give to the subject, I think it is enough.

I suppose the health officer is a very good officer. I have not a word to say derogatory to his character as an officer, or in any other way. But I do find this to be in accordance with the usual practice in this District—who are to blame for it I can hardly say—you can not appropriate too much money. However much you appropriate they do not leave any over. They are always expending and always asking more.

It occurs to me what is in the bill will meet all the proper demands of the health department. There are six sanitary inspectors. What do they do? They go around and visit the alleys and make reports.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The question was taken on Mr. PAGE'S amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HAZELTON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> In line 515 strike out the words "one food-inspector" and insert "two food-inspectors," and after "dollars" insert the word "each;" so that it will read: "Two food-inspectors, at $1,200 each."

Mr. HAZELTON. We have learned from the letter which has been read, and also from the argument as made by the gentleman from Virginia and others, the necessity for continuing that number. The necessity of the amendment having been clearly presented to the House, I will not attempt to discuss it further.

The question being taken on Mr. HAZELTON'S amendment, there were—ayes 26, noes 28.

Mr. STEVENSON. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. STEVENSON, and the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. HAZELTON.

Mr. HAZELTON. It appears to be the sense of the committee that the amendment will not be adopted. I therefore withdraw it.

Mr. HEILMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> In line 519 strike out "$1,000" and insert "$1,200;" so that it will read: "One pound-master, $1,200."

Mr. HEILMAN. I shall only say that this man has to keep a horse in order to get around. His salary was $1,200 last year, and it should be that if anything.

Mr. NEAL. I will say to the committee that a thousand competent men could be got to do this work at the salary provided in the bill.

The question being taken on Mr. HEILMAN'S amendment, there were—ayes 27, noes 35.

Mr. HEILMAN. A quorum has not voted. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HEILMAN, and the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. NEAL.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 43, noes 26.

Mr. PHILIPS. No quorum.

Mr. NEAL. Who makes the point of order as to a quorum?

Mr. PHILIPS. I make the point of order, and insist on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places.

The count was resumed; and the tellers reported—ayes 109, noes 41.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEAL. As the committee thinks the pound-master's services are worth so much, I move an amendment that hereafter the commissioners of this District shall pay $2 for common labor.

The CHAIRMAN. At what point does the gentleman desire his amendment to come in?

Mr. NEAL. At the end of this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I make the point of order on it.

Mr. HUNTON. While the gentleman from Ohio is preparing his amendment, will he allow the gentleman in charge of the bill to offer an amendment?

Mr. NEAL. Certainly.

Mr. COBB. Since the bill was prepared there has been a law passed creating an inspector of plumbing. I do not know exactly what are the duties of that office; or, rather, I know in what the duties consist, but I do not know as to the amount of labor necessary to perform them. I take it they will require for their discharge a skillful man. I think an appropriation to pay him should be put in this bill, and the sum of $1,800 has been suggested to me. I presume that will be enough.

I know that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] will not object to an amendment to the bill that adds to the amount of the appropriation. I believe the sum I have named is about the fair amount, and therefore I move that the bill be amended by inserting after the word "dollars," in the first line, the words "one inspector of plumbing at $1,800."

The question being taken on Mr. COBB's amendment, there were—ayes 20, noes 30.

Mr. HUNTON. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HUNTON, and the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. HAZELTON.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 5.

Mr. COBB. Further count is not demanded.

Mr. HUNTON. Yes; I call for a further count.

The count was resumed; and the tellers reported ayes 24, noes 39.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. NEAL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in at the end of line 525.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 525 add these words:

"Hereafter the commissioners of the District shall pay $2 per day for common labor."

Mr. BROWNE. And I move to amend the amendment by adding that eight hours shall be deemed a day's labor.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I make the point of order on the amendment that it is not germane.

Mr. McMILLIN. I make the point of order on the amendment that it changes existing law and does not retrench expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island has already made the point of order, and the Chair is of the opinion it is well taken.

Mr. FORT. I desire to offer an amendment. I would very much prefer to have it come in at some other place in the bill, but I offer it here, and think there will be no objection to it.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert after the pending paragraph the following:

"For the relief of children and other indigent persons found begging upon the streets, to be expended under the direction of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. HAZELTON. Is that amendment subject to a point of order?

Mr. FORT. I hope none will be made.

Mr. HAZELTON. I make the point of order upon it.

Mr. FORT. I would like to hear what grounds the gentleman has for his point of order.

Mr. KLOTZ. It does not do away with a market-house. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORT. It is certainly as serious a thing as a market-house. I take it that if the gentleman has no reason to urge for his point of order, the amendment is in order.

Mr. COBB. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] that the Committee on Appropriations have already provided in this bill $15,000 for the poor.

Mr. FORT. That may be, but not for this specific class of the poor. There is not a city on this continent where there is so much begging, especially by little children, as there is here in this city, and no man can tell whether these little beggars are really needy or not—whether they are begging for themselves or for their parents or others who send them out to obtain money, with which I am told they pay for liquor to get drunk upon.

If my amendment shall be adopted, the commissioners of the District can send some person home with these little children to find out where they live, how they live, and whether they need relief or not. If they need relief, it can be given them; and if they do not, it is not likely they will be found again upon the streets begging. I think no one will object to this amendment.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the point of order is well taken because, under existing law, the money in the Treasury is to remain there unless we change existing law so as to get it out. It will not do to say that this amendment does not change existing law, because there is as yet no statute providing for giving aid to this class of individuals. The very fact that there is no law to give them money, the failure of the statute to provide for any such thing, in view of the fact that the money cannot be taken out of the Treasury for this purpose without further legislation I think is conclusive evidence that this amendment would change existing law, and is therefore not in order.

Mr. HAZELTON. Perhaps it is due to myself to say a word or two upon this proposition. I assure the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] and the gentlemen of this committee that I have no objection to the exercise of the broadest charity by this Government, provided it is properly guarded by some law which has been carefully arranged and determined and comes within the powers of the Government.

Take this case. We are asked to appropriate $5,000 without making any direction as to how it shall be expended, without making any provision for the details of the expenditure. As the amendment now stands, to my mind it will simply invite into the streets a large number of pretended poor, instead of affording aid to those who might be actually in need of charity. If the gentleman from Illinois will bring forward a bill by which there can be established some institution into which these poor children may be taken and there cared for and educated, some bill providing means which may be given to the poor of this city with good results, by which it can be expended properly, then I will vote with him. I want it understood that I will go as far as anybody to establish such institutions as are proper to be established in this District for the benefit of the needy poor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the proposed amendment is new legislation, and therefore not in order.

The Clerk read the following:

INTEREST AND SINKING-FUND.

For interest and sinking fund on the funded debt, exclusive of water bonds, $1,213,947.97.

Mr. NEAL. I offer as a proviso to the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Treasurer of the United States, as ex officio sinking-fund commissioner, is hereby authorized, whenever in his opinion it will be more advantageous for the interest of the District of Columbia to do so, to sell the bonds authorized to be issued under the provisions of the sixth section of the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes," approved June 16, 1880, for the satisfaction of the judgments which may be rendered by said Court of Claims under the provisions of said act, and pay the said judgments from the proceeds of said sales, instead of delivering to said judgment claimants the said bonds as provided for in said act.

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to make a point of order upon that amendment with the view of getting at the facts of the case.

Mr. NEAL. I will state the facts, and then I think the gentleman will have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will reserve all points of order until I can hear the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. NEAL. The Treasurer of the United States, who is ex officio sinking-fund commissioner, in a report in regard to the condition of the sinking fund and of the funded debt of this District, lately presented to Congress, recommends that section 6 of the act of June 16, 1880, be modified so as to enable the Treasurer of the United States to satisfy the judgments of the Court of Claims either by delivering the 3.65 bonds or paying the money to be realized from the sales of such bonds, as may be most advantageous to the public interest.

The facts are that when the law of 1880 was passed the bonds were worth not more than par, while now they are at a premium of 2 and 3 per cent. If this amendment is agreed to, giving the Treasurer of the United States the discretionary power to sell the bonds and to pay the judgments of the Court of Claims in money, the premium upon the bonds will accrue to the benefit of the District of Columbia. This amendment, therefore, is in the interest of economy and not subject to a point of order. It seems to me that no one should object to it.

Mr. McMILLIN. One question?

Mr. NEAL. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. I understand that this amendment does not authorize the increase of the bonded debt of the District.

Mr. NEAL. Not at all; it only authorizes the Treasurer of the United States to sell bonds already authorized to be issued.

Mr. McMILLIN. From the statement made by the gentleman, I believe that whether the provision be subject to a point of order or not it ought to be incorporated into the bill.

Mr. HUNTON. I am glad my friend from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] withdraws the point of order. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is, in my opinion, eminently proper. Its object is to save the Government the premium on the 3.65 bonds. It authorizes the Treasurer of the United States, who is ex officio sinking-fund commissioner, to sell these 3.65 bonds at such premium as they may command in the market, and with the proceeds pay judgments on these claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEAL. I move to amend by adding the further proviso which

I send to the desk. I ask the attention of the Committee of the Whole to this proposition, for it is just as important as the one just adopted. I will give my reasons for it as soon as it has been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That the said Treasurer as ex officio sinking-fund commissioner, as aforesaid, is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase any of the funded indebtedness of the said District of Columbia for the sinking fund authorized to be created for the redemption and payment of the indebtedness of said District of Columbia as in his opinion may be for the best interest of said District of Columbia.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is not that embraced in the amendment just adopted?

Mr. NEAL. No, sir.

Mr. COBB. I desire to reserve a point of order on this amendment.

Mr. NEAL. The Treasurer of the United States, in the report to which I have already referred, makes the following recommendation:

That authority of law be given for the investment of the permanent annual appropriation for a sinking fund on the 3.65 loan in any of the bonds of the District of Columbia.

The law requires the Treasurer to purchase these bonds at par. They are now above par, and consequently, as the law now stands, he cannot purchase any of the bonds of the District for the purposes of the sinking fund. There are other bonds of the District besides these 3.65 bonds; and we propose to give the Treasurer a discretionary power so that the persons holding these 3.65 bonds cannot compel him to purchase them at a premium, or else to allow the sinking fund to go unprovided for.

Mr. McMILLIN. Under the existing law with what funds are the bonds to be paid for?

Mr. NEAL. The act requires that the sinking fund shall be invested in 3.65 bonds.

Mr. McMILLIN. From what source are the funds derived?

Mr. NEAL. From the general annual appropriation made for the purposes of a sinking fund. Such an appropriation is made in this bill, and has been made in every similar bill since the passage of the act. There ought not to be any objection to this amendment. It simply gives to the Treasurer of the United States a discretionary power so that whenever a corner is made upon him by the holders of the 3.65 bonds he may be enabled in his discretion to invest in other securities for the sinking fund of the District.

Mr. COBB. Though I regret very much to have general legislation put on this bill, I presume that this provision is right. I would like to hear it reported again.

The amendment of Mr. NEAL was again read.

Mr. COBB. I do not press any point of order against the amendment; but I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he insert the word "hereafter" after the word "that" and before "authority of law," &c.; so as to make the provision a general law.

Mr. NEAL. I have no objection to that. I modify the amendment so as to read "and provided further, that hereafter," &c.

The amendment of Mr. NEAL was agreed to.

For payment of the Linthicum loan, $40,000.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph just read. This sum of $40,000 was loaned by the Linthicum Institute of Georgetown to the District government for school purposes, I believe. The object of this paragraph is to pay back that sum. The managers of the Linthicum Institute earnestly request that this money be not paid back at present; and they make that request for the reason that under the will endowing the Linthicum Institute there will be some difficulty in loaning out this money in the District of Columbia if it be paid back now. The parties receiving the money will have to go into court to get authority for loaning it to private individuals. The government of the District of Columbia is now paying on other debts a higher interest than that which this loan bears. Hence it is suggested that the money be not refunded now.

The Linthicum Institute is an educational institution of Georgetown, endowed by Mr. Linthicum for the purpose of conducting a night school. That school educates a great many poor children, and educates them in the very highest branches of learning. Some of the teachers of that institute are professors in the Columbia College. There is no reason why the government should pay back this fund at the present time, especially when the institute requests that it shall not now be paid, and when also the District government is now paying a larger rate of interest on other indebtedness.

Mr. COBB. The will of Mr. Linthicum, under which this money was devised, requires that the fund shall be loaned on real estate security in Georgetown. Now, this is not such a loan; the District has not given real estate security, and the terms of the devise are not being followed.

This loan, on which for awhile 8 per cent. was paid, is now bearing 6 per cent. interest. I take it that the loan should be repaid, for the reason that this interest is a tax upon the general school fund of the District. The money is now loaned in a manner which was not intended by the devisor; and the same objection now made to the repayment of the loan must exist for all time to come. This objection arises from the fear that the money cannot be reloaned in strict accordance with the devise; in other words, that it cannot be loaned on real estate security in Georgetown. For this reason the parties propose that we shall keep this money indefinitely, and continue to pay 6 per cent. interest. But is it not better to pay off this debt instead of paying $2,400 a year as interest from the school fund, for the commissioners always charge this interest to the school fund. I submit that we ought to pay our debts when we can.

The question recurred on Mr. HUNTON's amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 33.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $2,500 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of the contingent fund of the District of Columbia, for the purpose of the establishment, and for the current expenses for one year, of an emergency hospital in connection with the Central Free Dispensary of the District of Columbia, to be expended on the order of the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Appropriations recommend an amendment to strike out that paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COBB moved that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. COBB. By unanimous consent, I ask leave to move an amendment which I think should be adopted. Information was received in regard to it since the bill was reported to the House. It is in reference to paying commissioners of the Court of Claims as provided for by law. They are authorized under the law, as gentlemen will remember, to appoint referees to take evidence in reference to engineering, &c., and to report to the court. The law fixes their pay at not exceeding $10 per day. There is no money appropriated for that purpose, and I have received a letter from the court asking an appropriation of $2,000 be made for that purpose. I presume it is right. If any gentleman objects to it, of course it will have to go over.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman will send his amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, after line 400, insert "for payment, on order of the Court of Claims, of referees appointed by the said court under act approved June 16, 1880, $2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COBB demanded the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question first recurred on the following amendment:

Line 26, strike out "$150,000" and insert "$300,000," and in the same line strike out "and fifty;" and in line 27 strike out "three" and insert "four," and after "and" insert "fifty;" so it will read:

"For repairs to concrete pavements, $50,000; for completion of New York avenue intercepting sewer, $7,000; for repairs to macadam roadways, $5,000; for materials for permit work, $20,000; for continuation of surveys of the District of Columbia with reference to the extension of various avenues to the District line, $5,000; for Boundary street auxiliary sewer, $50,000; for lateral sewers, $15,000; for dredging James Creek Canal, $5,000; for work on sundry avenues and streets, and replacement of pavements on streets named in Appendixes A and B annexed to the estimates of the commissioners of the District for 1882, (being schedules of streets requiring immediate attention,) $300,000; in all, $457,000."

Mr. COBB demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 132, nays 107, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—132.

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. CLARDY said: Not being here when my name was called, I now ask leave to vote.

Objection was made.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, by unanimous consent the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. HARMER with Mr. ELLIS, for this day, on political questions; but either may vote to make a quorum.

Mr. LAPHAM with Mr. KNOTT, for the remainder of the day, on all political questions.

Mr. HERNDON with Mr. SAPP.

Mr. ROBESON with Mr. EWING, on all political questions.

Mr. SCOVILLE with Mr. CROWLEY.

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia, with Mr. WILBER, on political questions.

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. KETCHAM.

Mr. BINGHAM with Mr. SMITH of New Jersey, on this vote.

Mr. ROBESON. I am paired with Mr. EWING on all political questions, but not regarding this as such, I have voted.

Mr. CROWLEY. The gentleman from Buffalo with whom I have been paired is present, and I have voted.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The remaining amendments of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union were then agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the passage of the bill upon which under the rules the yeas and nays will be taken.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 209, nays 25, not voting 58; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. MCKENZIE, by unanimous consent the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7101) to provide for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAKER. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the regular order.

Mr. SPARKS. I would like to know what the regular order is?

The SPEAKER. The regular order under the rule is the unfinished business.

Mr. COX. I rise to a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. I propose to report back from the Committee on the Census the apportionment bill, recommitted to that committee, which is a question of the highest privilege under the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. The House can determine, on the question of consideration, what class of business shall have priority. The Chair is advised that there are three gentlemen endeavoring to get the floor for different objects. The first business in order under the rule is the unfinished business. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas to proceed with the unfinished business, which bears the character of a special order as well, and known as the interstate-commerce bill. The gentleman from New York seeks the floor to report back from the Committee on the Census a bill touching the apportionment of representation, and the gentleman from Illinois has some purpose in view in connection with the floor.

Mr. SPARKS. I want to get up the bill for the relief of General Porter, as it precedes the bill of the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that it does not now precede it, because the bill which the gentleman from Texas alludes to has the characteristic of being unfinished business, and in that way takes precedence of the bill referred to by the gentleman from Illinois. If the gentleman from Illinois moves to go to business upon the House Calendar, it would bring the gentleman from Texas on the floor first on the unfinished business, and thereafter reach other bills on the House Calendar, one of which is the Porter bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COX. If there is to be any debate I want to have an opportunity of taking part in it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will give each gentleman an opportunity as far as the House will permit.

Mr. REAGAN. All I desire to say is, that I wish to ask the House to permit general debate upon this bill for two days, and if it will agree to do that I will call the previous question on the amendment to the original bill and let the House determine which it will take up under the five-minute rule and dispose of.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a question which involves the interests of the people of this entire Union. Action upon it is called for by many Legislatures, by many chambers of commerce and boards of trade throughout the whole country.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Texas is to make a speech upon this question I would like to have an opportunity of replying to him.

The SPEAKER. It is a question for the House to determine whether it will consider it or not.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman is going into the merits of the question.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope I will be indulged for a moment without interruption.

Mr. O'NEILL. Other gentlemen have rights upon this floor as well as the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will see that the gentleman's rights are protected.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire one moment here to call the attention of the House to this measure. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that in my judgment this House has before it no more important question; nor do I believe that one of greater magnitude to the vital interests of the country can come before this Congress. I desire to have the House give it at least brief consideration. That much I think is due to the American people and to their interests. I desire that it shall not longer be superseded by private bills and by petty measures of all kinds that would not occupy the attention of a country court. This session has already gone so far and no measure of this kind has been permitted to be acted upon. As I have said, there is no measure before this Congress that ought to demand so much attention as this, while other measures of less importance have been permitted to occupy the attention of the House. I say again, sir, that the interests of the American people demand that some consideration should be given to this matter. The interests of every class of the American people in every portion of the country are directly involved in this question and call for at least a little consideration and a little attention at our hands. I ask the House, therefore, to consider it for two days, allow general debate to run for that time, and if it shall be agreeable to the House I would like to get meetings of the House for debate only in the evenings during those two days, so that gentlemen who desire it may have an opportunity of speaking upon this question. We can act upon the measure and test the sense of the House whether it is desirable to secure the passage of the bill or not.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I come before the House and ask for the fulfillment of a high constitutional duty, one that must be performed every ten years, and unless it be done at this session, while members of the State Legislatures are waiting our action, thirty-two of the States having only biennial sessions of their Legislatures, it will require extra sessions of their Legislatures, and involve an expense upon the people of those States aggregating six or eight millions of dollars. I know the importance of the bill to which the gentleman from Texas refers. It has had consideration and attention time and again. But if it should pass this House there is not much probability of its passing the other. But we must pass this apportionment bill, otherwise an extra session of Congress may be necessary, at great expense, or thirty-two extra sessions of the Legislatures of our States must be held in order to avert the trouble we had in 1850, 1860, and 1870, by reason of the dilatory action of Congress upon this important subject.

I therefore ask the House, not in the interest of any one class, but of the whole represented people of the country, that this bill be taken up, considered, and disposed of. I raise the question of consideration on the bill called up by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say just one word. I feel as the gentleman from New York does, a willingness and a desire to see the apportionment bill pass. But gentlemen will remember that after each census was taken in the years to which the gentleman from New York refers, 1850, 1860, and 1870, no apportionment bill was passed till the subsequent Congress, and the States whose Legislatures did not meet subsequently to that had to elect their extra number of members by general ticket.

Mr. COX. At great expense.

Mr. REAGAN. If this be a constitutional question, the Constitution has been violated every census.

Mr. COX. I will ask my friend from Texas this question, whether after the passage of the last apportionment bill the Legislature of the State of Texas had not adjourned sine die and could not be got together again to make the redistricting?

Mr. REAGAN. In cases where a Legislature cannot come together to make a redistricting in time for the election of the next Congress the members can be elected on a general ticket, as has always been done heretofore.

We have yet a month of this session and a little more. I ask for but two days of general debate. Three days will enable us, in all probability, to dispose of this great question. And then there will be ample time to pass the apportionment law and ample time to pass the appropriation bills. There is time enough to do all that; but I do not wish the apportionment measure to come in and displace one commanding such general attention and so much interest as the measure I now call up. I ask the House to proceed with the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order that questions relating to priority of business are not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to give notice that I antagonize both the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN;] and that if their propositions are not carried I shall move that the House go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2272) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to examine and settle the accounts of certain States and the city of Baltimore growing out of moneys expended by said States and the city of Baltimore for military purposes during the war of 1812. That bill has been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary and is now in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOOKER. And I give notice that if we go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union I shall ask the committee to consider the first bill on the Calendar, the bill for the ascertainment of the amount due the Choctaw nation. I will antagonize the gentleman from Virginia by insisting that we proceed with that bill.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The claims to which the bill I have reported has reference, were existing before the railroads were made. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL rose.

The SPEAKER. The point of order has been made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that priority of business is not debatable. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his point of order?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to say to this House that, although in the estimation of the gentleman from Texas his bill is the most important bill before Congress, I, for one, do not want to delay all public business for the sake of a bill containing sentiment only and nothing practical.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] calls up the unfinished business, which is the interstate-commerce bill, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] raises the question of consideration.

Mr. COX. I also raise the question of privilege under the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. If the House is against the consideration of the interstate-commerce bill it will determine in the negative and then the apportionment bill will next have its turn. The majority will determine between the two. There is no occasion to raise now the issue of privilege.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 84, noes 108.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for the yeas and nays. I desire the record to show who are in favor of disposing of this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 98, nays 150, not voting 44; as follows:

So the House refused to proceed with the consideration of the interstate-commerce bill.

At the conclusion of the second roll-call,

Mr. SPRINGER said: I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope that will not be done.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

The Clerk then read the names of those voting.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. COOK with Mr. PAGE. If present, Mr. COOK would vote in the affirmative.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. COX. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not essential.

NAVAL STATIONS ON THE AMERICAN ISTHMUS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for consideration and appropriate action by Congress, a letter from the Secretary of the Navy in relation to the proposed establishment of naval stations of the United States on the American Isthmus. In this paper the current testimony of prominent officers of this Government for a long series of years, as to the feasibility and necessity of establishing such stations and the great advantage to flow therefrom to the naval and commercial interests of the United States, is clearly set forth, and the considerations adduced cannot but commend themselves, I am confident, to the careful attention of Congress. Convinced of the wisdom and propriety of the suggestions thus presented, I recommend to Congress the appropriation of the sum named by the Secretary of the Navy, to be at his disposal at once, for expenditure as soon as suitable arrangements can be made to the proposed end.

R. B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, February 2, 1881.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WILBER until Tuesday next.

GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relative to the management of the Government Hospital for the Insane; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I now report back from the Select Committee on the Census the apportionment bill.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to introduce a bill for reference only.

Mr. COX. I cannot yield.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to raise the question of consideration upon the bill which the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] proposes to report at this time.

The SPEAKER. The report will first be received.

Mr. COX. I report back from the Select Committee on the Census the bill (H. R. No. 7026) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census.

Mr. SHERWIN. On behalf of the minority on the committee I report a further substitute for the bill of the majority.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I now raise the question of consideration on that bill, and give notice that if the House does not now proceed to its consideration, I will move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider a bill which involves the computation of interest to several of the States for moneys advanced and loaned to the General Government during the war of 1812.

The question was taken upon considering the apportionment bill, and it was decided in the affirmative.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The SPEAKER. The House has decided to proceed with the consideration of the bill just reported from the Select Committee on the Census. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That after the 3d of March, 1883, the House of Representatives shall be composed of three hundred and eleven members, to be apportioned among the several States as follows: Alabama, eight; Arkansas, five; California, five; Colorado, one; Connecticut, four; Delaware, one; Florida, two; Georgia, ten; Illinois, nineteen; Indiana, thirteen; Iowa, ten; Kansas, six; Kentucky, ten; Louisiana, six; Maine, four; Maryland, six; Massachusetts, eleven; Michigan, ten; Minnesota, five; Mississippi, seven; Missouri, fourteen; Nebraska, three; Nevada, one; New Hampshire, two; New Jersey, seven; New York, thirty-two; North Carolina, nine; Ohio, twenty; Oregon, one; Pennsylvania, twenty-seven; Rhode Island, two; South Carolina, six; Tennessee, ten; Texas, ten; Vermont, two; Virginia, ten; West Virginia, four; Wisconsin, eight.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I ask that the bill for which this is reported as a substitute be now read.

Mr. COX. I informed the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] to-day that the bill which has just been read is one reported from the Select Committee on the Census to this House as an original bill. The bill which was sent to the Census Committee is still left there. The gentleman from Pennsylvania understands this perfectly.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have raised this point in order that it may be now decided by the Chair. I find by reference to the printed bill, which has been read, that it is reported as "a substitute for House bill No. 6958." I may desire to know what that House bill No. 6958 is, before I am required to vote on this proposed substitute of the committee. Moreover, I may desire to move to amend the text of that House bill 6958, if pending, before I vote on the substitute. Hence I desire that the original bill be read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] object to the reading of the original bill for which a substitute is reported?

Mr. COX. I have no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. That will be more satisfactory to members.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And the original bill is to be considered as pending before the House?

Mr. COX. No, sir; it is not.

The SPEAKER. The substitute for the original bill is first to be considered.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows, for I so informed him, that the original bill is not reported to the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If the original bill is not before the House, why is it to be read?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman to desire its reading for information. The original bill the Chair thinks should come with the substitute just read as a substitute for that original bill.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not want to antagonize particularly the bill of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] nor do I want to obstruct public business. There is a point involved in this matter, however, which may be an important one. At a specific time during the discussion and pendency of this bill I may wish to offer an amendment to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not be prevented from doing that in any event.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. My desire to do so may depend upon whether the original House bill No. 6958 is pending before the House or not. If pending, together with the substitute reported for it, I can move to amend the text of the original bill before a vote can be had upon the substitute or amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] thinks this substitute is in fact an original bill, and that it does not come back in manner as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] supposes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. How can the bill be in committee when it is here referred to by number and substantially reported back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, is not the very first question before the House whether or not this bill shall be substituted for House bill No. 6958?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not clearly comprehend. As now advised it seems that the gentleman from New York reports a substitute for an original bill referred and the original bill should be a part of the report. If the substitute should be voted down, then the original bill comes before the House for consideration.

Mr. COX. The matter is indifferent to me so that the House understands it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the original bill had better be read, so that the House may understand more fully the subject.

Mr. COX. Why does the gentleman want it read when it has been in print two weeks?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I withdraw the request for its reading if the original bill is considered pending before the House.

Mr. COX. The gentleman withdraws the request.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. With the understanding that the original bill is pending before the House. Am I to understand that if my request is withdrawn the original bill is pending before the House open to amendment?

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 6958) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That after the 3d of March, 1883, the House of Representatives shall be composed of three hundred and one members, to be apportioned among the several States as follows: Alabama, eight; Arkansas, five; California, five; Colorado, one; Connecticut, four; Delaware, one; Florida one; Georgia, nine; Illinois, nineteen; Indiana, twelve; Iowa, ten; Kansas, six; Kentucky, ten; Louisiana, six; Maine, four; Maryland, six; Massachusetts, ten; Michigan, ten; Minnesota, five; Mississippi, seven; Missouri, thirteen; Nebraska, three; Nevada, one; New Hampshire, two; New Jersey, seven; New York, thirty-one; North Carolina, eight; Ohio, nineteen; Oregon, one; Pennsylvania, twenty-six; Rhode Island, two; South Carolina, six; Tennessee, nine; Texas, ten; Vermont, two; Virginia, nine; West Virginia, four; Wisconsin, nine.

SEC. 2. That whenever a new State is admitted to the Union, the Representative or Representatives assigned to it shall be added to the number.

SEC. 3. That in each State entitled under this apportionment the number to which such State may be entitled in the Forty-eighth and each subsequent Congress shall be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory, and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants, and equal in number to the Representatives to which such State may be entitled in Congress, no one district electing more than one Representative.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, there is a slight error in that bill as read. The number of Representatives assigned to Massachusetts should be eleven; "ten" is a misprint.

Mr. COX. That has been already corrected in the RECORD, at the request of the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON. It has been corrected in the RECORD, but not changed in the printed bill. I ask that the correction be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that a clerical error as to Massachusetts may be corrected.

Mr. COX. That has all been changed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. But it has not been changed in the bill as read. The House should make the change. Without objection, the change will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. FIELD. I desire to call attention to another correction. In the bill which was read at the desk "Wisconsin, nine," should be "Wisconsin, eight."

Mr. COX. That has already been corrected.

Mr. FIELD. The correction was made in regard to Massachusetts.

Mr. COX. And the other correction was also made, at the request of the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. COX addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SHERWIN obtained the floor.

FORT LEAVENWORTH MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. ANDERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 7102) to provide for the sale of certain portions of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CALIFORNIA NAVIGABLE WATERS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair,) by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report showing how to prevent injury to the navigable waters of California; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the expenditures under the appropriation for contingent expenses of the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

ATLANTA A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. FELTON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 5376, a bill (H. R. No. 7103) to constitute Atlanta, Georgia, a port of delivery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

By Mr. COX: The petition of E. W. Barber and others, citizens of Michigan, for an amendment to the Constitution which will permit the Legislatures of the several States to levy a duty, tariff, or tax upon all the products of the soil and factories brought into each State from other States—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DICKEY: The petition of W. M. Butler and 72 others, citizens of Brown County, Ohio, for the passage of an income-tax law—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Charles Wood and 82 others, of Brown County, Ohio, for the passage of a bill to prevent fraud in the sale of patent-rights—to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petition of Thomas W. Hare and 80 others, and of L. A. Wright and 42 others, citizens of Brown County, Ohio, for the passage of the Reagan interstate-commerce bill—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of W. H. Scott and 121 others, citizens of Clearmont County, Ohio, that the Commissioner of Agriculture be made a Cabinet officer—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. DUNN: The petition of F. W. Lynn, for pay due him as a messenger of the House of Representatives—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FINLEY: The petition of citizens of Ohio, that the Commissioner of Agriculture be made a Cabinet officer—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, the petition of citizens of Ohio, for the passage of a law establishing a permanent winter and summer tariff on all railroads terminating on the seaboard—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of citizens of Ohio, for legislation on the subject of interstate commerce—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of citizens of Ohio, for legislation to protect innocent purchasers of patented articles—to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petition of citizens of Ohio, for the reduction of the tax on cigars—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HERNDON: The petition of the county of Mobile, Alabama, to be reimbursed moneys expended by it in improving Mobile Harbor and Bay—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. LAPHAM: Resolutions of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, for legislation to prevent the consolidation of certain telegraph companies in the United States—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. NEW: The petition of citizens of Indiana, for a reduction of the tax on cigars—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ORTH: The petition of citizens of Indiana, for amendment of the patent laws—to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petition of citizens of Indiana, for the passage of an income-tax law—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of citizens of Indiana, for the passage of a law regulating interstate commerce—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of citizens of Indiana, for the passage of a law making the Commissioner of Agriculture a Cabinet officer—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. WARD: The petition of the American Iron and Steel Association and others of the largest manufacturers of Pennsylvania, for the passage of the Eaton tariff-commission bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WILBER: Resolutions of the Legislature of New York, asking for legislation to stamp out the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia among cattle—to the Committee on Agriculture.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 3, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in reply to a resolution of January 27, 1881, a copy of the contract or terms of settlement and agreement entered into between the commissioners of the District of Columbia and the representative of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of John Schoemaker and others, citizens of Illinois, pensioners of the United States, praying for an amendment to the pension laws in regard to certain classes of wounds; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of George W. Deardoff and others, citizens of Havana, Illinois; the memorial of Oliver Finley and 34 others, citizens of Georgetown, Illinois; and the memorial of Benjamin C. Goodhue and others, citizens of Lansing, Michigan, surviving soldiers of the war for the Union, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of William Ward and others, citizens of Virginia, colored soldiers in the late war, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN. I also present a memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago, in the following words:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, by order and on behalf of the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago, respectfully represents unto your honorable bodies that

Whereas this board is convinced that the adulteration of human food and drugs is a serious and growing evil, an outrage upon an otherwise sufficiently suffering humanity, greatly detrimental to the public health, tending to increase the death-rate and to lower the standard of public and private morals, and that its eradication by well-considered legislation is both desirable and necessary; and

Whereas a bill entitled "A bill to prevent the adulteration of food and drugs," prepared after long and careful consideration by a committee of able experts, on behalf of the National Board of Trade, has been presented to your honorable bodies by the representatives of that organization, with the request that favorable action thereon may be had at an early date: Therefore,

Having carefully considered the provisions of said bill, your memorialists respectfully petition and urge your honorable bodies that said bill may receive from you that consideration which the great importance of the subject seems to demand, and that it may be enacted into law during the present session of Congress.

Respectfully submitted, on behalf and by order of the Board of Trade of Chicago.

H. W. ROGERS, JR., President.
CHAS. RANDOLPH, Secretary.

CHICAGO, January, 1881.

I do not know to what committee such memorials are usually referred; probably it should go to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Such memorials have been heretofore referred to the Committee on Agriculture, the Chair understands.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I present the petition of 30 soldiers of the late war, some of whom were enlisted in Iowa regiments and others having served in regiments of other States, but who now reside in the State of Iowa, praying for the passage of a bill equalizing the bounties of soldiers at the rate of eight and one-third dollars per month for the time served. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN presented resolutions of the Bar Association of Cumberland County, Maine, in favor of the erection of a monument in the city of Washington, in memory of Chief-Justice John Marshall; which were referred to the Joint Committee on the Library.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, presented the petition of Mary Brown, widow of George W. Brown, Company B, Twelfth Ohio Cavalry Volunteers, praying that she be granted arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SAUNDERS presented a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, relating to the bill (S. No. 2057) for the relief of Arthur J. Carrier; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS. I present the petition of sundry citizens residing in the State of Kansas, formerly soldiers, praying for the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims, which I ask may be laid on the table, the bill having been reported from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator if in presenting that petition it would be out of the way for him to read a note that is at the head of it. I should like to have it read for the information of the Senate. I have seen quite a number of petitions of that kind, and should like to have the head-note read.

Mr. INGALLS. I should be glad to have it read. It was evidently left on through an inadvertence on the part of those who sent it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NOTE.—Sign three copies; forward one to your member of Congress, one to your United States Senator, and one to Headquarters Grand Army of the Republic. Attach more paper if needed.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely asked to have the note which is at the head of the petition read, in as much as there were some remarks made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] the other day about the memorials in opposition to this bill, in order to show the character of the petitions that come to us in favor of the passage of the bill. There is a note at the head of them saying, "Sign three copies; forward one to your member of Congress, one to your United States Senator, and one to Headquarters of the Grand Army of the Republic." It is sent out from Washington City.

Mr. WITHERS. I will say if that is to be read, I shall ask for the reading of several petitions and memorials from organizations of soldiers.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection in the world; I merely desired to have the head-note read.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to know if it is designed to create the impression that the request to send one copy to the Grand Army of the Republic is an indication that Senate bill No. 496 is countenanced and supported by the Grand Army of the Republic or by its officers? I do not understand that the intimation this orginates in Washington would be found to be a fact; but I do understand that the Grand Army through its officers designs to create the impression that it is favorable to the passage of this bill.

Mr. PLATT. If I may be allowed one moment. I hold in my hand an address issued by one of the pension agents in Washington asking soldiers to sign a memorial, the form of which is given, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 496, some extracts from which I will take occasion at the proper time during the discussion of the subject to read.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KERNAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1867) to provide for the refunding of certain taxes in conformity with a decision of the Supreme Court, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2072) for the relief of the widow and daughters of the late Connolly F. Trigg, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BLAINE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1964) for the relief of Greenleaf Cilley, reported it without amendment.

Mr. GROOME, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of F. E. Stewart, administratrix of the estate of Michael S. Stewart, deceased, of Tennessee, praying for compensation for wood cut under contract for the Government, submitted a report thereon accompanied by a bill (S. No. 2146) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURNSIDE submitted a report to accompany the bill (S. No. 1833) to remove charge of desertion from the military record of William Hull, heretofore reported by him; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALL, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2414) for the relief of Mrs. S. A. Wright, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1782) for the relief of William G. Budlong, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1792) for a public building at Rochester, New York, reported it with amendments.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to report back the joint resolution (S. R. No. 140) in regard to the extension of the franking privilege, and to say on behalf of the committee that they have considered the resolution and find themselves equally divided as to its merits, and therefore report it back without recommendation, and ask that it may be placed on the Calendar for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator if the committee who reported the joint resolution would not as lief it should lie on the table so as to be called up without going on the Calendar?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am perfectly content to have done whatever the introducer desires in regard to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It goes upon the Calendar in either event.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That is what I supposed. It can be called up in one case as well as the other.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2147) to provide for the purchase from Mrs. Hubard of a bronze statue of General Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsion, (by request,) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2148) for the relief of John H. Huyett; which was read twice by its title, and referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SAUNDERS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2149) to establish an assay office in the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. PLUMB asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2150) to grant the right of way through the Fort Bliss military reservation to the Rio Grande and El Paso Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2151) to restore certain articles of silverware to Mrs. Isabella S. McRae; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

SAMUEL POLLOCK.

On motion of Mr. MCPHERSON, it was Ordered, That the vote by which the bill (S. No. 1706) for the relief of Samuel Pollock was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 1805) relative to the revolutionary battle-field of Bennington;

A bill (S. No. 1573) to provide for the furnishing of certain public documents to soldiers' homes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 146) to provide for printing and distributing the index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semi-monthly.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the resolution of the Senate to print 15,560 copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1880.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the resolution of the Senate for the printing of 1,000 copies of the report of the joint commission appointed under the eighth section of the act of Congress of June 21, 1860, to examine into the organization, system of discipline, and course of instruction of the United States Military Academy at West Point, submitted December 13, 1860.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in some, and non-concurred in other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6730) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in some and non-concurred in other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6969) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 6729) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico;

A bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 372) authorizing the Public Printer to print reports of the United States Fish Commissioner upon new discoveries in regard to fish-culture; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 388) to provide for publishing an edition of Hayden's Atlas of Colorado.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 143) authorizing the inspection and issue of an American register to the Egyptian steamship Dessoug; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Concurrent and other resolutions are next in order.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senate to take up and proceed to the consideration of the resolution which I submitted on the 15th of June last, relating to the right of the President of the Senate to count the votes of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama calls for the consideration of a resolution standing on the Calendar, formerly submitted by him.

Mr. LOGAN. If the morning business is through——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Alabama under the morning-hour business.

Mr. LOGAN. I understood that the call was for the introduction of resolutions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair announced the order of business, which is "concurrent and other resolutions." Does the Senator from Illinois desire to submit a resolution?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; if the business of the morning hour is over in reference to the introduction of bills and resolutions, I desire, in pursuance of the notice I gave a few days ago, to move that the present and all prior orders be postponed temporarily in order to take up the bill (S. No. 1992) to place Ulysses S. Grant, late General and ex-President of the United States, upon the retired list of the Army.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] and the Secretary will report the resolution called for by him.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. MORGAN on the 15th of June, 1880.

Mr. MCDONALD. I ask the Senator from Alabama to allow me to give a notice.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well.

Mr. MCDONALD. I desire to give notice that on the conclusion of the special order I shall move to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill (S. No. 19) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes. I shall ask for the consideration of that bill on the close of the special order.

Mr. INGALLS. To what does the Senator refer, the unfinished business or the Indian severalty bill?

Mr. MCDONALD. The Indian severalty bill.

Mr. INGALLS. That was informally laid aside for the purpose of considering the pension appropriation bill, which is now under consideration; but the understanding was that at the conclusion of the consideration of the pension bill the Indian severalty bill should be resumed.

Mr. MCDONALD. I do not propose to antagonize the Indian severalty bill, but to make the motion I suggested as soon as that is disposed of; and I desire the friends of the measure with which I am charged to be advised of this notice, for if we are to do anything with the bill at this session we should take action upon it at an early day.

My notice, then, Mr. President, is that as soon as the special orders now indicated are disposed of I shall move to take up this bill and ask the friends of the measure to aid me as far as they can in bringing it before the Senate. It is an important measure, and if not acted on now cannot be disposed of at this session.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Senator will allow me to ask him whether he means by the bills "now indicated" the two bills that are before the Senate?

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes; the pension appropriation bill and the Indian severalty bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the resolution before the Senate.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If the Senator from Alabama will allow me, I should like to give notice that as soon as I can do so——

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator can give his notice at any time, and a notice amounts to nothing practically at this stage of the session.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following concurrent resolution, submitted by Mr. MORGAN June 15, 1880:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President of the Senate is not invested by the Constitution of the United States with the right to count the votes of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States so as to determine what votes shall be received and counted or what votes shall be rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. The resolution I have offered is one that becomes immediately important, if it has any importance whatever, and I hope the Senate will proceed with its consideration.

Mr. CONKLING. Although I wish to hear, I cannot hear a word the Senator says.

Mr. MORGAN. It is not really my fault, but I am not in a condition of health to-day to exert myself much. I have brought forward this resolution for the purpose of getting an expression from the Senate of the United States; and as the resolution is at present framed, from the House of Representatives, a concurrent expression, upon a question in regard to which, in my judgment, it is within the power of the two Houses to declare the law. So far as I am personally concerned, I have heretofore debated this question in the Senate during the present session at such length as I desired, through the courtesy of the Senate; and if I should make any extended remarks on this resolution now I should only be repeating what I have said heretofore.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not know, and I am not alone in my ignorance, the resolution to which the Senator is speaking. Will he be kind enough to indicate it or allow it to be reported?

Mr. MORGAN. Let the resolution be reported.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. This subject has been so frequently before the Senate that almost every Senator who has been here for more than one term at least has had an opportunity of expressing his opinion, and I think that almost the entire body who have been here that length of time have given expression to their views upon the subject. I do not care myself to engage in the discussion of a trite subject, and I am entirely willing at any moment of time that any Senator thinks the vote ought to be taken, or when it shall be indicated that there will be no further discussion on the resolution, that a vote shall be taken on it.

I will say, moreover, that the language in which the resolution is couched was intended to express the idea that the President of the Senate, whether he might be President pro tempore or whether he might be the Vice-President of the United States, is not invested by the Constitution with the authority to determine what votes shall be received and counted, or what votes shall be rejected; that that matter belongs to some other jurisdiction, some other power, which this resolution does not undertake to define. The resolution goes simply to the extent of declaring that that officer has not that power.

Whether we have the right to control the President of the Senate in a matter of this kind, I admit is a question that is open to debate. My own views about it are fixed and settled. I regard the President of the Senate as an officer of the Senate, whether he is here under the Constitution as an ex officio officer of the Senate, or whether he is here by the election of this body, and that like all other officers of the Senate he is charged by the law and the Constitution, and probably by the rules of the Senate, to execute its will and pleasure whenever that may be properly and constitutionally expressed, and that the Senate cannot get into such a relation with its officer, as that he would have a right to disregard its order upon any subject that fell within the purview of its authority.

I am not well enough this morning to engage in an extensive discussion of this measure, and with this brief explanation of the purpose of the resolution I shall not detain the Senate any further.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is the resolution before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is, and the question is, will the Senate agree to the same? Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not quite ready, Mr. President. It appears to me that after what has transpired, if not before, it is quite unnecessary to make any declaration at this present time upon the subject. I have not heard, even in the newspapers, that the present Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate has threatened or has even been suspected of any intention to be a usurper, if the counting, (with all that that implies, more or less,) of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States by the President of the Senate be a usurpation. It does not appear to me, therefore, that a bald declaration of opinion upon a purely and practically abstract question, which does not contain any declaration of opinion touching certain other bodies on the same subject, is wise, if we are to make a declaration of our opinion upon this subject; though this does not purport to be a declaration of opinion; it seems to stand in the nature of an edict. It does not say that in the opinion of the Senate the President of the Senate has not that power, but it purports to be the declaration of a fact which is to be enforced by the authority of the Senate in some way, perhaps at the point of the bayonet of the Sergeant-at-Arms, who, I believe, is the executive officer of the Senate, or at the point of his mace if he has one,—something of that kind.

Now, I am opposed to making any half declaration, if any declaration at all, at this time. There is a proverb, I believe, that a half truth is an untruth. I think that as this is stated, even if you put it in the form of an opinion, leaving it just where it is, it is a half truth, assuming it to be a truth at all, as I think it is, if by the word "counting" you mean quite a different thing; Senators will excuse the Hibernian form of putting it. Counting a vote is an arithmetical or numerical performance; and deciding what paper is a legal vote is quite a different thing. If this resolution read that the President of the Senate is not invested, by the Constitution merely, with authority to decide whether the State of New York, or the State of Georgia, or the State of Vermont is entitled under given circumstances to participate in the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States, I should give it my most cordial adhesion, if the question arose at a time and under circumstances when it was necessary to say anything about it. If it still further declared that by the force of the Constitution merely this body possessed no such power, I should give that also my cordial adhesion. If it said that the House of Representatives, by force of the Constitution merely, possessed no such power, I should also accede to that with equal cheerfulness. If it said that both the Houses together, (whatever that may mean,) except as a "presence" which the Constitution speaks of, did not possess by force of the Constitution alone the power to decide whether the electoral vote of the State of Vermont or of Georgia should enter into the decision of the question who are elected President and Vice-President of the United States, I should say amen to that with all my heart. If it went still further and said that all three together, the President of the Senate, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, by force of the Constitution alone, possessed no such power, I should agree to that most cordially, not only as a mere intellectual question, as a legal definition of the terms and purport of the Constitution, but as a question of the highest patriotism in respect of preserving the liberties of the people of the United States against usurpation and tyranny on one side and anarchy on the other that would flow from a contrary decision, as it seems to me. For I happen to be one of those truly democratic persons who believe that one of the fundamental securities and perhaps the chief security of the liberty of the people of this Republic as a nation depends upon the security of every right in these respects, as well as a great many others, that the Constitution has given to the States of this Union, and I believe that so strongly that I do not intend that any act or declaration of mine shall contribute in any degree toward assuming by force of constitutional construction alone any authority in any one, or all, or any combination of the three personages (if I may use that expression) to whom I have referred.

I should hope, therefore, that the Senator from Alabama would not press this resolution at this time. There is no occasion for it in point of fact. It does not state except by construction and inference—if you can put construction and inference upon it—what is the real question; and that is the decision respecting the rights of States to cast their votes at all. It does not state, if it were put in that form only, one-half or one-third of what I believe to be the whole question, which if we are to make any statement about it at all, ought to be embraced one way or the other.

So I trust that my friend from Alabama will not insist on bringing the Senate to a vote upon this subject so very important at this present time.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I think it may safely be assumed that this question has been discussed so much and for so long a period that every Senator on this floor has his mind made up upon it. Believing that, I hope that we may soon come to a vote upon it, and I hope that the resolution will be adopted without any amendment at all. I think it presents one very clear proposition; and if anybody wants to have other propositions considered, he can do it by introducing a resolution, or whatever may be the proper form to adopt to bring it before the Senate. I hope that this resolution will be adopted precisely as it is and with as little debate as Senators may feel that it is their duty to indulge in.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator from Ohio sits down, will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Having been absent for a day or two I was not here when this resolution was reported. I shall be obliged to the honorable Senator from Ohio to inform me as far as he can do so what is the practical purpose of the resolution. Why should any expression of opinion on this point take place in the Senate now? I say to the Senator that I ask this question not by way of any strategy or contrivance in debate, but I ask him because I presume that some reason may have been assigned or can be assigned which I know nothing about.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not think it is necessary to go into that. I am not actuated, as some members of other bodies appear to have been, by fears that the democrats are going to perpetrate some great wrong in the count of the electoral vote next week, and I am quite as certain that there is no intention on the part of our republican friends to do anything that they think would be wrong; but I think it is a very good time to express the opinion of the Senate on this question. That is all I have to say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not ready for it, and in order to test the sense of the Senate whether it will now with all the other business on its Calendar go into a discussion of all that is involved in this and the cognate things at this time, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont moves to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. THURMAN. On which I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So do I.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when Mr. BROWN'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. BROWN] is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] on this question.

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BALDWIN. My colleague [Mr. FERRY] is paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.] If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] is paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. SHARON.] If the Senator from Kentucky were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BAILEY. On political questions I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] on this question. If he were here, I should vote "yea," and I presume he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 32; as follows:

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am bound to infer that the Senate has refused to lay this resolution on the table for fear that it may be called up again to-morrow morning or at some such time. Therefore I think, in order to enable the Senate to express its opinion upon, the resolution in its present form——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair reminds the Senator that the morning hour has now expired.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate continue the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That involves the postponement of the pending order.

Mr. MORGAN. I make that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama moves to postpone the pending order, being the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the Anthony rule, for the purpose indicated by him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to inquire what is the pending order to be postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending order is the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the standing order of the day, the Anthony rule. The question is on postponing that order.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] is paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 23; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The order is postponed.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate continue the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion was to postpone the pending order and that was the only orderly motion according to the previous rulings of the Vice-President. We are now therefore——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was advised by the Chief Clerk, not knowing the condition of business himself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question now is on whatever anybody may move. We have not yet voted to proceed to consider this resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was informed that the resolution was pending, probably erroneously.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution previously read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. TELLER. On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] If he were present I should vote "nay."

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution as submitted by Mr. MORGAN.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I rise to make a motion to commit this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary. It seems to be assumed by the older Senators in this body that the subject has been exhaustively discussed in previous years, that they have their minds thoroughly settled upon the great questions that are involved in this resolution in all their ramifications, and that they are ready to vote upon it, when it is admitted by everybody that there is no occasion in existing emergencies for the expression of legislative opinion on the subject at all. I am the youngest member on the floor of the Senate, I think, and I am not anxious to vote on this resolution. I admit that the tendencies of my own mind and of my own investigations on this subject, so far as I have been able to make them, are rather favorable than otherwise to the resolution; and yet I am not prepared to vote for it at this time. I think the topics involved in it are altogether too important for the majority of the Senate and the older members of the Senate to be justified in forcing an expression of opinion by a formal vote when there is no occasion for it, as they admit; and if I am obliged to vote upon this subject during this session or any time I shall be glad to be instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary when opportunity has been given them to form and to express it maturely.

If there were necessity for immediate action, I should feel otherwise; but as it is I think it almost a matter of courtesy which older members should perform toward those who are less ready to vote until there shall be occasion for it, that this resolution be sent to the Judiciary Committee, a committee organized by the Senate to treat of questions of this kind and to give to other and younger members who have less opportunity for the investigation of this particular class of subjects the benefit of their examination and counsel. I hope that the resolution will be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the resolution be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLAIR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not rise to debate this matter, but to call the attention of my friend from New Hamshire to the fact that a majority of the committee that reported this resolution are members of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if any committee has reported this resolution, it is a committee of some caucus and not a committee of the Senate of the United States. I have no doubt, therefore, that the Senator from Ohio refers to some committee of which the Constitution and the rules of the Senate have not any cognizance. That may be true. We have been told in the public newspapers and otherwise informed that since the advent of that happy day, when the party that is called or calls itself the democratic party came into power at the Capitol, the legislative branch of the Government has been chiefly carried on nights and Sundays and at other convenient times by an organization embracing people of particular views or a want of particular views, as the case may be, considering out of legislative halls what would be I must suppose the most popular thing to do next or not to do next, and its rescripts and arrangements have been brought forth and attempted to be put in the form of laws and resolutions and so on. I did not certainly know whether that was true although I was strongly inclined to believe it, until the Senator from Ohio tells us that a majority of the committee who reported this resolution constitute a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to interrupt right there?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. THURMAN. I did say so; but I said it under a misapprehension. The resolution had been here so long that I was under the impression that it had been reported from the committee of which the Senator from Alabama is chairman. I find I was mistaken in that, and therefore my statement to the Senator from New Hampshire was incorrect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, that was what I was going to try to show from the face of the official print now before me. This does not appear to be a caucus print precisely, which I hold in my hand. This says:

> Forty-sixth Congress, second session.—Senate Mis. Doc. No. 103.
> In the Senate of the United States, June 15, 1880, ordered to be printed.
> Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution:

Here follows the resolution. My friend from Ohio, therefore, was mistaken in saying that a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, to which the Senator from New Hampshire has proposed to refer this resolution, constituted a majority of the committee or a part of it, (he did not say a majority, I believe,) that reported this resolution, if by that he referred to a committee of the Senate, because no committee of the Senate has ever considered this resolution, for it has not been referred to any committee of the Senate at all. It may still be true, and I am inclined to believe it is, that a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary composed a part of some committee or other assemblage of individuals and persons who, outside of the hours of the Senate and the hours of the people in that "other place"—which I believe is the constitutional phrase—have considered what sort of a resolution it would be most advantageous to the interests of that association of gentlemen to whom I have referred to permit. So the correction that my friend from Ohio has made is really a comparatively unimportant one; but we now have the fact that this resolution that is supposed to be of so much importance, either in respect of pending events or in respect of something else, as to induce a majority of this body to set aside all the pension cases on the Calendar and all the cases of private claims and all the cases of general public consideration, for the purpose of taking up this resolution at this time.

Now, what the Senator from New Hampshire has said has very great force. It may not be in accordance with the designs, (and I believe that is a perfectly polite word; I do not mean to use any other)—it may not be in accordance with the designs of that committee, whatever it was, or that other body of people, if it were not a committee, who framed this resolution; but if the reference to a committee is in accordance with the practice of the Senate that has endured and been followed in general for a longer period of time than that to which the Senator from Ohio referred yesterday when he said that for seventy years the Senate had marched over to the House of Representatives to be present at the opening of the certificates and the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. Why, then, should not this resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, or to the committee of which the distinguished Senator from Alabama is the chairman to take into consideration the state of the law touching all these questions? Why should we not have the consideration, the study, the conclusion, with its reasons, of one or the other of these committees? The committees of this body are supposed to be at present in safe hands, unless indeed it should be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims of which my distinguished friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] is the chairman, and perhaps the fear might be that if it were so referred it might not be in the hands of a majority of people for the moment who would be entirely willing from that mere cause to carry into effect the edicts of any caucus, if there had been one, but might be disposed to consider the resolution on its constitutional or, borrowing the name of the committee, its revolutionary merits, whatever they might be. So I do not think that I would vote to send it to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. It might imperil the cause of constitutional freedom this week and next, to do so, and I should be sorry to do anything imperiling the cause of constitutional freedom either this week or next or any other week that I know of. But to send it to the Committee on the Judiciary of which the distinguished Senator from Ohio is the facile princeps would be to send it, I was going to say—but that would be getting outside of anything that is in the rule—I was going to say back to the bosom of its friends from which it sprang. I am not sufficiently informed to be justified in saying that exactly; and indeed, as I look at the phraseology of the resolution, I am strongly inclined to think that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary did not compose it or write it out. It does not bear the characteristics that I have so long observed with admiration that adorn the character and cultivation of the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. But still as the Senate evidently considers it embraces a subject of great constitutional importance, (whether of practical importance or not at this time remains to be seen,) if the Senate does with it as it has done almost always with similar questions it will gladly send it to that committee for early and careful and constitutional consideration and report, and I hope it will be done.

The whole subject deserves inquiry. It is one of the most interesting and important, perhaps I ought to say the most interesting and important of any of the subjects that can enter into the theory or the operations of the Government of the United States. Why not, then, allow that committee to consider it? Has anybody stated the reason? We have not heard any. Why not allow that committee to report upon the subject, and to define, if it can, what it believes to be the powers, and where they may be vested, mentioned in the article of the Constitution touching this subject, and what means, if any there may be, can be wisely and lawfully provided for clearing up all points of probable or even possible dispute and difference, all collisions and tumults of party bias and hate, and putting the state of the law, as the phrase is in the appointment of the committee of the Senator from Alabama, into a clear condition, defining or limiting or lodging these duties in the hands of somebody or some board or some tribunal? Why not?

It is only a short time since that the present occupant of the chair [Mr. INGALLS] offered a resolution upon this subject which had been taken, as I am informed—and I think I have seen it since—from the institutions of the fathers, from the days of Jefferson, and which simply provided that the Senate, in the peformance of its constitutional duty, would receive the House of Representatives on the day fixed by law, for the purpose of doing whatever the Constitution required to be done in respect of the opening and counting of the votes for President and Vice-President; and yet although that resolution provided for the simplest formality, although it had been sanctified by commendation, unanimously received, of the men who occupied the Halls of the two Houses of Congress in 1801, it was sent, on the motion I believe of the Senator from Alabama, certainly on the motion of some of the gentlemen who seem apparently disposed not to refer this resolution, to the committee of which that Senator is chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of half past one having arrived, the Senate resumes the consideration of its unfinished business, being the Indian severalty bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to postpone——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the title of the bill which is the unfinished business.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. No. 1773) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to postpone all prior orders, with a view of continuing the consideration of the resolution which has been under discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the pending order be postponed.

Mr. WINDOM. What is the pending order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will again report the unfinished business of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the title of Senate bill No. 1773.

Mr. WINDOM. I had the impression that the pension appropriation bill was the pending order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is misinformed. The bill just reported by the Clerk is the unfinished business which was yesterday by unanimous consent informally laid aside for the purpose of considering the pension appropriation bill, and the bill just reported by the Clerk was called up prior to adjournment last evening and became the unfinished business of the Senate. The Senator from Alabama now moves that the pending order, which is the unfinished business just reported, be postponed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Postponed till when?

Mr. MORGAN. With a view of continuing the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are only two motions to postpone that I know of under the rules, if the rules make any difference; one is to postpone to a day certain and the other is to postpone indefinitely; and therefore I should be glad to have the question put in the way the rules require.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is correct.

Mr. THURMAN. I suggest to my friend from Alabama to make his motion to postpone until to-morrow, and if we get through with the pension bill it will be easy enough to rescind that order and take up the allotment bill. The Senator from Vermont has made the point that the rules require a motion to postpone to a time certain or indefinitely. Therefore I suggest to my friend from Alabama that he move a postponement until to-morrow.

Mr. MORGAN. The purpose is not to displace that order of business but to dispose of this resolution. It is not in hostility to that measure at all. I therefore modify my motion, and move to postpone the consideration of the present order until to-morrow with a view to take up the resolution which has been under discussion this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the pending order be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] stepped out of the Chamber a moment ago and asked me to pair with him. If he has not voted I shall refrain from voting; otherwise I should vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER. As this assumes a political phase, I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] I would vote "nay" if he were present.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 19; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order, the unfinished business, is postponed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think the Senate must not have considered exactly the idea throwing aside this Indian bill in this way; therefore I move to reconsider the vote by which it was postponed until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves that the vote by which the pending order was postponed until to-morrow be reconsidered.

Mr. EATON. Did the Senator vote with the majority?

Mr. HARRIS. Did the Senator from Vermont vote for the motion to postpone?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not.

Mr. EATON. Then he cannot make the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut make a point of order on the motion made by the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. EATON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has been under discussion this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has heretofore been read by the Clerk.

Mr. BOOTH. Before the vote is taken I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that a general appropriation bill, the bill making appropriations for pensions, has been before the Senate now for two days, and it is very important that it should be passed. I therefore trust that the motion of the Senator from Alabama will not be concurred in, and that the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the pension bill.

Mr. HOAR. I expect to vote for the resolution of the Senator from Alabama, and I agree with him that it is a proper resolution to be passed during the present session of Congress, possibly with some amendments which may suggest themselves to the Senate. I think it is proper, in consideration of the recent history of this country, that a declaration to the extent certainly to which this resolution goes, should be put on record. But I do not think, and I appeal to him whether I am not right, that this should be insisted upon at the present time, to the displacement of all the other important business before the Senate. Let the electoral count go on; let both Houses proceed under the resolution which has been sent down to the other House from the Senate already. No man then will suppose that there is any purpose anywhere—nobody in the country will be disturbed by the idea that there is any purpose anywhere except what appears disclosed on the face of the resolution itself. There will be no embarrassment in dealing with proposed amendments or modifications from the impression growing out of the fear that possibly some unseen meaning may lurk in this resolution which will embarrass a very important constitutional duty that is so soon to be performed.

Mr. President, what reason is there which can be given for displacing the proposition to facilitate the settlement of the pension cases now pending, for the postponement of that pension bill? Whatever may be the policy which will be agreed upon, everybody, I suppose, agrees that there should be some provision, either by a simple increase of administrative force or by the pending amendment to that bill, to grant relief to the soldiers who are now waiting for their pensions. There is nothing in tragedy more moving than some of the appeals which come to Senators in their mail day after day from soldiers and widows who are dying broken-hearted at the delay of justice under the existing administration of the Pension Office. In saying that, I mean not to intimate any reproach in the least to any existing executive officer. I believe, on the contrary, that the failure is a failure on the part of Congress to provide an adequate administrative force in the Pension Office and in the other various offices; but there are soldiers by the thousand whose honest claims were made two and three years ago, whose evidence as they believe is ample, and yet who get not even a response. They are obliged to send to their Senators or Members to avail themselves of their influence to learn why it is that not even a response is made acknowledging the filing of the evidence on which their title to relief depends. Every day, every hour that the Senate defers action upon this question increases the probability that this session of Congress will pass away without any adequate relief to this most meritorious class of claimants. And it seems to me that when the Senate has reached and undertaken the consideration of the pension bill, when, if I correctly recollect, a Senator is entitled to the floor for the expression of his opinion upon the bill who has commenced but not yet concluded his remarks, we ought not to lay it aside for a mere naked declaration of an opinion on any question, however important.

I will aid by my vote the Senator from Alabama to take up and to pass this resolution next week, or within a very short time, when the existing pressure of the pension bill shall have passed away; but the insisting upon the right of way to this scheme here and elsewhere is an attack, and a most dangerous attack, possibly a fatal attack, upon the measures calculated to relieve the pensioners who are waiting for justice.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I would not venture to say a word on this question, which I think would be more properly said by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, did I not suspect from remarks made by the Senator from Vermont as to the origin of this resolution that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations may be a little embarrassed, and therefore does not feel at liberty to urge his appropriation bills as he otherwise would do. Hence I feel it to be my duty to say a word in behalf of the Appropriations Committee. We have now pending the bill appropriating some fifty million dollars for pensions. We have also prepared, and now before the Senate, ready for action, another bill making appropriations for the Post-Office Department. There is also in the Committee on Appropriations, ready for action, and will be, I suppose, reported to the Senate very soon, the bill making appropriations for fortifications. So it will be observed that the Senate is a good deal behind the House in its action on the appropriation bills. I know if the honorable chairman of that committee, with the zeal which he always displays in behalf of the appropriation bills, were not embarrassed by some cause which I cannot explain, he would stand up here in the presence of the Senate and urge immediate action upon these bills.

There are but four weeks left of the session. If we expect to complete the appropriation bills and avoid an extra session, it seems to me of the utmost importance that we should give to the appropriation bills the right of way, instead of laying them aside to take up a mere political measure, if it be such, that will occupy probably one or two or three days' time.

There is a special reason that I wish to submit, in addition to what has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts, why the pension bill should be passed at once. It is not merely an appropriation to pay pensions for the next year; but the Senate has added since the bill was reported from the committee nearly eighteen million dollars to pay deficiencies. Those deficiencies are absolutely necessary to be provided for; and I am informed by the Commissioner of Pensions—at least I heard him make the statement—that there are many pensions which cannot now be paid which have been passed upon, but the money cannot be furnished because it has not been appropriated. I think I am not mistaken in that fact; if I am the other members of the Appropriations Committee will correct me. There, then, are over seventeen million dollars of deficiencies with pensions that have been allowed unpaid which ought to be paid at once, and the money ought to be furnished.

Now, I submit that the Senate cannot, with any justice to this great class of deserving American citizens, lay aside this bill and further postpone the payment of pensions found due and only awaiting the supply of money, in order to take up an unimportant measure for the sake of a political discussion.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope in view of what the gentlemen on the other side have severally said and in which they seem to be very earnest, that they will pardon me for a suggestion. They are very anxious to save time. Evidently they are sincere in that. They admit that this is a very unimportant matter anyway, and some of them say they are inclined to favor it anyhow, and a good many of them have favored it. Now, I suggest to the gentlemen that if they will just quit talking we will pass this measure and get it out of the way in fifteen minutes, and we might as well get rid of it in fifteen minutes as in fifteen hours. If they are really sincere and want to save time, let them quit talking. If they continue talking it will be the talk, and not the resolution, that consumes time.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Georgia will agree to reciprocate that great favor, I will agree for one to quit talking now if he will quit talking the next time I ask him to.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not understand the Senator. Let us vote now.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, having heard the distinguished and taciturn Senator from Georgia, I feel moved to ask a question. Before doing so, however, I would make to the honorable Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, as I do now, my acknowledgments for the very luminous and satisfactory answer which he was good enough to give to a question of mine a few moments ago. I asked him the object of pressing the resolution now; and his answer must have satisfied every inquiring mind in the Senate. Now, in the hope that I may receive an equally satisfactory answer to another question, I venture to propound that to whom it may concern; and I shall be grateful to any Senator on either side who will favor me with the information, where does this resolution come from, the one the Senate is asked to take up?

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator from Alabama, I believe, offered it; it is on the Calendar upon his motion.

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend from Pennsylvania expresses a belief which shows there is not such faith, no, not in Israel. I wonder if the Senator from Pennsylvania really believes that this resolution comes from so distinguished a source, and from that source alone, as the Senator from Alabama. If he does, then all these Senators have been making use of many idle words, for which I hope they will be brought into judgment, especially the Senator from Vermont who, in some talkative observations that I listened to from him some time ago, stated that it had been alleged here that this resolution was reported from a committee, and then he went on to say that that committee must belong to that invisible empire known as the democratic caucus. Now comes the Senator from Pennsylvania, who in the chance medley of newspaper reports is called the charioteer of that caucus; the newspapers say he presides in it himself personally, with headquarters in the saddle I presume when he takes the field in person; and he says that this resolution comes from the honorable Senator from Alabama.

Well, Mr. President, it could not come from a more distinguished or a more thoughtful Senator; and if it does come from a single Senator as a resolution not sanctioned by any committee, either by any authorized committee or by any of those invisible, unauthorized, nondescript but potential committees, (which my honorable friend from Florida [Mr. JONES] smiles with satisfaction when he remembers control and govern the business of this body,) then I submit to the Senate that it presents a question additional to those which I have heard discussed. Is it possible that at this stage of the session and upon an abstract question, a resolution offered by a single Senator, never referred to a committee, never reported by a committee, not having the imprimatur and authenticity of a caucus of the democratic party, is to be taken up not only against the regular orders of the Senate, not only against the committees of the Senate and their reports, but against the appropriation bills, which we have understood, as I thought by common consent, were to have what is called in the Senate the right of way. If that is so, without going any farther I should concur most fully in the objections which have been made by other Senators to any such proceedings. I submit that it makes the action of the Senate as to its order, as to the arrangement of its business, a mere hap-hazard chance affair from day to day.

And yet, Mr. President, I expect at least to be prepared at the proper time for the question covered by this resolution, and for the treatment that question receives in the resolution; and therefore I say to the Senator from Alabama and to other Senators who favor this proposition that at an appropriate time, at any time when the question comes conveniently and practically before the Senate, I shall be found with them in denying that the presiding officer of the Senate, be he who he may, whether the Vice-President or the President of the Senate elected by the Senate, has any power whatever to adjudicate whether the certificate of the electoral votes from a State shall be counted or not, or if there be two such certificates which shall be counted. This resolution declares:

> That the President of the Senate is not invested by the Constitution of the United States with the right to count the votes of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Did the resolution stop there, I should have great doubt about it; the Senator from Alabama no doubt would have great doubt about it. I say no doubt he would, because he has added other words to exclude that doubt. Did the resolution stop where I have stopped in reading it, and the operative word should be deemed the word "count," different if not conflicting opinions might well arise upon the exactness and legal truthfulness of the proposition it would assert. That I say because I conceive that counting may be of various kinds. He who counts the chairs in the Senate Chamber counts them, no doubt, within the clear definition of the word. The expert in money, the cashier or receiving or paying teller of a bank who counts coin or bank notes, with a view to separating the true from the false, to detect the counterfeit coin or the counterfeit bill, also counts. But between the function he performs and the function of him who counts the fingers of his hand, there is a difference so broad that it need not be pointed out.

So, there being no dispute about electoral votes, there being no doubt that every State which has voted had the right to vote; in other words, that every State claiming to be a State is and was on the day when the votes were cast a State of the Union; there being no doubt about the authenticity of the papers; there being but one electoral certificate from the State; there being in short nothing whatever to do in order to make it a fact accomplished, save only to open and exhibit the contents of one paper after another, and then to tabulate and add together the votes as shown, I should not be prepared to say that the President of the Senate had not as much power as would suffice for that. In the presence of the two Houses, and in the absence of objection, practically, virtually, in common parlance if not in strict exact legal phrase, he would have the power.

You, Mr. President, have no power to appoint any committee, in a strict sense; yet should a message come from the House of Representatives that the House had disagreed to an amendment and a conference were asked, whoever at that moment happened to be the occupant of the chair would appoint a committee of conference on the part of the Senate. It would be done sub silentio; it would be done with the assent of the Senate; it would be done as the exertion of a power, some part of which would be drawn, of course, from the fact that the man who makes the appointment is the presiding officer of the body; the residue of the power to do the act would be drawn from the body itself because of the assent it would give. So, nobody dissenting, there being no question about the validity, identity, or authenticity of electoral votes, should the President of the Senate proceed to that purely ministerial, in one respect hardly even ministerial, function—I might almost say mere manual, formal, matter of course thing which would be the adding up of these votes, the displaying of the certificates before the two Houses, their submission to the tellers appointed by the two Houses, unquestionably some part of his power to do it would be beyond that conveyed in the mere assent of the witnessing bodies. How much of it, what proportion of it, if it could be measured in exact scales, is not important for the present purpose. Some of it would result from the function of the presiding officer and his function as recognized in the Constitution, and some portion of it would result from the assent, the acquiescence, and therefore the authority of the two Houses of Congress assembled before him. I say, then, that had the resolution asserted merely an absence of power in the presiding officer of the Senate to count, because of lack of definition of the word "count," I should at least hesitate to agree to such phraseology. It however concludes with these words:

> So as to determine what votes shall be received and counted or what votes shall be rejected.

I may feel at liberty hereafter to criticise that language, and if so, only with a view of making more unmistakable, if I can, the idea which I have no doubt it is designed to convey. I will not do it now. I allude to it merely to say that the resolution means to distinguish, it does distinguish between what in one sense would be a "count" within the meaning of the lexicon and within the meaning of the law and what in another instance, although a quite different function, might also fall within the word "count." The concluding member of this resolution was, I assume, designed to deny to the presiding officer of the Senate that judicial or quasi-judicial power, that power of deciding or determining, which must be invoked when the question of the validity, authenticity, or identity of electoral votes arises. I observe the Senator from Alabama does me the honor to listen to that statement, and perhaps he will do me the favor to let me know whether I am right in the supposition.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from New York is quite right in the view upon which the resolution was drawn, unless it may be as to the mere question of identity. I have not considered that proposition. I do not regard it as being included in the words I have used there, though it may be. I am not committed on that point, however.

Mr. CONKLING. I will say frankly to the Senator that he has touched one matter to which I referred a moment ago when I said that I might possibly venture to criticize this language. He says now that the question of the identity of votes might not be brought within the scope of these words. Suppose from the State of New York there had been sent to the presiding officer of the Senate an electoral certificate by a messenger and a duplicate by mail; suppose apparently, and ostensibly from the same authorities, afterward and within the allotted time should come two other duplicates, and on examining them it should be found that the result was not the same as evidenced by the two certificates; suppose one should declare that one of New York's thirty-five electors had voted as none of his associate electors voted, had voted separately for a President of the United States and for a Vice-President of the United States, one of them not being a resident of the State in which he lived; that would be a constitutional vote; and the question would arise whether the certificate which attested that New York's thirty-five electors had voted together, or whether the certificate which asserted that thirty-four of New York's electors had voted together and one had voted adversely, was to be received and counted. There would be a question of identity. The Senator perhaps may say that it could be described by other phrases, that it might be also a question of validity. I submit that practically it would be a question of identity. So would the question of identity arise in many other not impossible, hardly improbable cases, and I do not believe that the presiding officer of the Senate has power to determine that question.

The inquiry in a given instance is how Connecticut has voted; how the electors appointed by the State of Connecticut have cast their ballots, and that question may be made up of many elements. It may begin with the inquiry, first, whether the State of Connecticut appointed any electors at all or not; second, who those electors were; third, whether they voted and voted at the time and place required; fourth, whether they voted and certified their votes according to the Constitution and the act of Congress executing the Constitution, and so on. These questions precede the count at last or the refusal to count at last these votes; and neither might be more nor less than a question of mere identity. Do they present occasion for the action of the President of the Senate? These words, I submit, if they do not cover all the cases to which the law they assert applies, should do so, and should be restricted so as to cover no other case.

It is said that the State of Georgia (without impediment, error, or failure in any other respect, I will assume) sends here an electoral certificate which evidences the votes of electors cast not at the time and at the place designated by law, but cast on a day which the law did not designate for that purpose. Of course I will not express, if I have one, any opinion as to the ultimate resolution that should be made of that question. I refer to it to treat it for a moment only as a question whether that certificate is valid or not, whether it is competent or not, whether it complies with those provisions of the Constitution and of the law, without which it would be of no consequence any more than any fugitive paper on which men had written their names and recitals. When that question is presented, in my belief the presiding officer of the Senate as such, unauthorized by any special warrant for that purpose either of the law-making power or of the two Houses of Congress, has no more power to decide and determine it, than the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate. He has power to do other things. He has power to be the recipient, and upon his conscience and his oath the custodian of the certificates; he is bound by his obligations to preserve them carefully and inviolably; he is empowered and commanded to bring them into the presence of the two Houses, and there open them; and at that point the Constitution turns its back on him and speaks to him no longer. If by the authority of the two Houses he is authorized or commanded to affix his signature to a certificate which recites or asserts or formulates the result, that he has power to do, not alone because he is presiding officer of the Senate, not alone because the Constitution invests him with any function or power whatever, but because, in lawyer's phrase, pro hac vice he becomes the organ, the agent, the deputy of the Senate and of the House of Representatives to whatever extent that may impart power, or of the whole law-making power including the Executive if the authority under which he act be a statute as distinguished from a concurrent resolution.

Mr. EATON. May I ask my friend if that is not simply his action as the presiding officer of the two Houses, not as the presiding officer of the Senate?

Mr. CONKLING. I understand my honorable friend to mean by that a suggestion of his own, not a question.

Mr. EATON. I do.

Mr. CONKLING. Then although I am prolonging my very casual and unpremeditated part in this debate as I did not mean to do, I will say a word to the honorable Senator from Connecticut with whom, by the bye, I agree upon all matters as often and as fully as it is possible for me to agree with any gentleman disabled and embarrassed by the politics held by my distinguished friend. I know of no man who succeeds, in spite of his democratic belief, in being right oftener than the honorable Senator from Connecticut. I cannot, however, agree now fully with that he says if I understand him. The idea he conveys to me is that you, Mr. President, [Mr. INGALLS in the chair,] were you, as it would be very proper you should be, the presiding officer of the Senate next Wednesday, might, under the direction of the Senate and the House, do something more vigorously, more effectually, at least more appropriately than you a member of the Senate could do were you not the officer presiding in the joint meeting of the two Houses. Without an opportunity to reflect upon it, I greatly doubt that. It does not occur to me that the act of presiding, the permission of the two Houses to preside, the honor and precedence conferred by being selected to preside, over the two Houses of Congress met together, would of itself impart any authority or confer any power upon that presiding officer beyond the power to preside with whatever that implies.

The two Houses have met together; I will not say have convened, because I think that is a misleading word in this connection. The two Houses have met together. The electoral certificates have been brought in; they have been opened; none of them have been challenged; they have all been tabulated by the tellers; they have been announced in the hearing of the two Houses and of all the people who witness the proceeding. The declaration has been read first by the tellers, or one of them, to the presiding officer, and second, by the presiding officer to my honorable friend from Connecticut, and to such other of my friends on the other side as are still in doubt of the result of the last presidential election, or whom the news of that election have not yet reached. All that has been done, and the Houses have separated; the Senate has come back into its Chamber; the House remains in its Hall. The two Houses have before resolved, as they have heretofore in ancient times frequently resolved, that a particular person named shall sign a certificate which shall perpetuate and recite the action that day of the two Houses thus met. How does the Senator from Connecticut conclude that the person who had presided in this joint meeting which is now dissolved, who comes afterward to be denoted as the person to present to the President-elect his certificate, to sign that certificate, does that because he presided in the joint meeting, or that he could not do it as well had he not presided at all in the joint meeting? How does the honorable Senator from Connecticut arrive at that conclusion?

Without finally answering him, in the frankness of a first impression I should say that the authority under which this certificate is to be signed is the direction of the Senate and of the House, and I should say that the Senate and the House had just as much power to select and depute the honorable Senator from Florida before me [Mr. JONES] to go, as I know it would give him infinite pleasure to go, to a republican President and Vice-President, however much it might wring his heart to do so had they been democrats, and apprise them that the two Houses had ascertained and made record of the election in the different States. When the honorable Senator from Florida went to perform that function, with all the pomp and circumstance not only but with all the eagerness which I know would attend him upon such a mission, my belief is that it would be as imposing, as effectual, as complete in law, as if the honorable Senator from Florida had been also the person selected to act as moderator of the meeting composed of the members of the two Houses when the electoral votes were counted; and I strongly suspect on reflection that my honorable friend from Connecticut, older and a better lawyer as he is, will say I am not quite wild in my suggestion.

I do not believe that the office of President of the Senate, or that the Constitution, or that the act of presiding, confers any power upon the presiding officer of the Senate or of the two Houses except, after having beyond those presented and opeend the electoral votes, to discharge duties which by parliamentary law, usage, and intendment pertain to a presiding officer. When he comes on the next day or a future day to set down and make record historically of what has been done before, and certify to the persons chosen as the incumbents of the offices, that they have been ascertained to be elected, that act in my belief is to be performed by him not in virtue of the circumstance that it so happened that he and not another was selected to preside over the two bodies when they met together. If the Speaker of the House of Representatives were ill, if in his absence the compliment of presiding in the House should fall for a day or for a week upon the youngest and the least notable member of the House, and if on the occasion of the two Houses meeting together some disposition of mere compliment or courtesy should lead the Senate or its presiding officer to waive his privilege of presiding, and the temporary Speaker, a member of the House, the junior member of the House, should preside, I think my honorable friend will scarcely argue that that circumstance would clothe him with power to do anything except to preside; and if afterward the Houses separated and each directed him to be the mouthpiece and organ of the two Houses in informing the President and Vice-President-elect, my honorable friend I think would not insist that he derived the power to do that, the authority to do it, from the circumstance that he had presided, instead of from the fact that the two Houses by deliberate resolution had committed to him, in the language of the old commissions, having special confidence and trust in him, the duty to go and do their mission and utter their voice in that behalf.

But, Mr. President, the Senate owes the honorable Senator from Connecticut some reprimand or penalty for inflicting upon it this part of the remarks I have made. I rose not to discuss this question at length, but to disabuse the mind of the Senator from Alabama, so far as one Senator on this side is concerned, of the idea that there is a disposition either to misstate the law or to shrink from an assertion of the law, because it is not deemed wise and expedient upon a mere moot question now like this, to thrust aside pension bills, appropriation bills, and all other bills, on the 3d of February, in a session which is necessarily to end on the 3d of March.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] to proceed with the consideration of the resolution submitted by him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McDONALD, (when the name of Mr. VOORHEES was called.) My colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] is paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAWES, (after having voted in the negative.) I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] and desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.] Were he here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BAILEY. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BALDWIN. My colleague [Mr. FERRY] is paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am requested to announce that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.]

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 20; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is before the Senate, and will be reported by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. MORGAN June 15, 1880, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President of the Senate is not invested by the Constitution of the United States with the right to count the votes of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States so as to determine what votes shall be received and counted or what votes shall be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to commit the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAYARD, (when Mr. RANSOM'S name was called.) The Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] as I believe has already been announced, is paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] The Senator from North Carolina would vote "nay" if present.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. TELLER. On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 32; as follows:

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very sorry that the Senate has apparently intimated that the committee of which my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] is the honored and distinguished chairman, is not suitable to be trusted with an investigation of this subject; but I cannot help supposing that it will have more confidence in the committee of which the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is the chairman. So, without taking up any time, which I do not wish to do, I move that the resolution be referred to the Select Committee to take into consideration the state of the law respecting the ascertaining and declaration of the Result of the Elections of President and Vice-President of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to commit the resolution to the select committee named by him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 35; as follows:

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Inasmuch as it appears that the Senate is unwilling to have this subject considered by a committee, I take it it is willing to consider it itself, though perhaps that is stating it rather too strongly. So I move to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "that" in the first line of the print the words "in the opinion of the Senate, neither the Senate, nor the House of Representatives, nor," and then after "is" to strike out the word "not," so as to make it read correctly, so that the resolution if thus amended will read:

That, in the opinion of the Senate, neither the Senate, nor the House of Representatives, nor the President of the Senate is invested by the Constitution of the United States with the right to count the votes of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States so as to determine what votes shall be received and counted or what votes shall be rejected.

It will be noticed that this resolution is measuring the power of the President of the Senate by the test of the provisions of the Constitution alone, and not by such a test as might exist if under the Constitution a law had been passed regulating the subject; so that the resolution as it stands purports to be a declaration that the Constitution itself, in the absence of any law, has not vested the power to determine what votes shall be received and counted, or what votes shall be rejected, in the President of the Senate.

I propose, as I said some time ago, not to state a half truth. While the Senate is attempting to guard against what it might conceive to be a usurpation, if such a thing should be attempted by the President of the Senate, I think it equally ought to guard, so far as the declaration of its opinion can go, against what I consider in the absence of a law would be a similar usurpation by either the Senate or the House of Representatives under the Constitution alone. I believe that if the framers of the Constitution had been called upon to express their opinion as to the possibility of vesting the power to decide, as a constitutional power, such a question in either House of Congress, it would not have received a single vote. It will be remembered that when the Constitution was framed it was proposed at one time that the electors should be appointed by the National Legislature, as some people at that time, thinking we were to have a nation, called it; and that was finally, after discussion, and after, I believe, having been once agreed to, entirely reconsidered, and the notion of investing any power over the choice of a President of the United States in the National Legislature was absolutely rejected. When they came to provide for the possibility of a failure to elect by a majority of all the electors appointed, they took care, after exhaustive discussion, to provide not that the two Houses of Congress in joint convention or separately should elect a President and Vice-President of the United States, or either of them, and that neither House voting by persons should be authorized to exert any power or will over the matter, but that the respective States, in their character as such, represented in the House of Representatives, should, voting by States and not by numbers, in the case of a failure to elect by the electors previously provided for, elect a President of the United States.

That, to my mind, with the other circumstances and debates which I do not wish to take up time to refer to at this time, demonstrates that the language of this provision in the Constitution can by no legal construction, can by no historic illumination, can upon no principle of safety or policy, be considered as conferring upon either the Senate or the House of Representatives, as a deposition of a constitutional power by force of the Constitution alone, which this resolution is speaking about, any such power, any more than I agree it can be considered that the language of the Constitution warrants the inference that the President of the Senate has any such power.

Now, I want to make a complete declaration upon this subject, and not a half declaration, if we are to declare at all; and so I move this amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. I only rise to make a single observation, which is that the resolution would read somewhat amusingly, as it seems to me, if the amendment were adopted. It would then read, That it is the opinion of the Senate, the House of Representatives concurring. If the House of Representatives concurs, that is the opinion of the Senate; if the House of Representatives does not concur, then it is not the opinion of the Senate. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is perfectly true, and it is pefectly true as the resolution stands now:

Resolved by the Senate—

Then comes the parenthesis—

(the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President of the Senate is not invested by the Constitution with a certain power that is named. That is to say we are of that opinion if the House of Representatives is willing that we should have it; or we are of that opinion, to put it in the very best possible way for the safest intent of the resolution, if the House of Representatives is also of that opinion. So I hope my friend will not criticise my having followed the artistic and rational language of the resolution itself reported from that spiritual, and immaculate, and unseen, and indescribable committee, to which the honorable Senator referred.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps I ought to say in fairness and propriety that if this amendment should meet with the approval of a majority of the Senate, I shall move to so correct the resolving clause in the first line as to not leave it where the Senator from Ohio correctly states it is left, and where the resolution itself is left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand, as I was diverted when the Senator from Vermont offered the amendment, and if my understanding is wrong I beg him to correct me, that he intends to assert that neither the President of the Senate alone, nor the Senate alone, nor the House of Representatives alone, has this power.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is exactly what my amendment says.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. RANSOM. I desire to state that I am paired to-day on all political questions with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KIRKWOOD, (after having voted in the affirmative.) When I voted I forgot that I was paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] He has gone out of the Chamber unwell, and requested me to pair with him on all votes on this proposition, which I did. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. DAWES. I am paired upon this question and upon all political questions for the afternoon with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, (after having voted in the negative.) I withdraw my vote upon the proposition.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 28; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COCKRELL. I aimed to get the ear of the Chair before the roll-call began, to announce why I should vote in a certain way; and not having had that opportunity, I did not vote, for the simple reason that I believe the naked proposition that the Senate by itself independently, or the House of Representatives by itself independently, or the President of the Senate by himself independently, has no authority, or right, or power, whatever to decide what electoral votes shall be counted, and that nothing else should be counted. I believe that proposition, and therefore I did not vote in this case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am strongly inclined to believe it is true myself, and that is why I voted for it, and it would be entirely incorrect to say that that might account for its not having got a majority of the votes of the Senate, and yet the majority of the Senate is perfectly consistent, or approximately consistent, in refusing to accede to that simple proposition, for in the joint rule, as it was called, that the Senate did pass at its last session, I believe, a provision was contained that was exactly the opposite of the principle of the amendment I had the honor to offer, for that joint rule did provide that in respect of certain questions as to the reception and computation of the votes coming from States and purporting to be electoral votes, one House alone, of its own will, no matter what the other thought, should decide that question. That is good State-rights doctrine, I suppose, because it was agreed to!

Mr. THURMAN. I said this morning that I hoped the resolution would not be amended, and in accordance with the wish I then expressed I voted against the amendment of the Senator from Vermont without any reference whatsoever to its merits or demerits. I do not wish to see a solution of all the conundrums that can be propounded in reference to presidential elections tacked to this resolution, which is a plain, simple, clear proposition and ought to stand on its own bottom and be decided as a distinct and separate proposition. Therefore I voted against the amendment, and I do not think I shall change my mind and vote for any amendment whatever. I want to see the resolution passed as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. THURMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, it is always embarrassing to differ from one's party friends upon a question which is political or quasi political in its character; and although upon a former occasion I had the honor to express my sentiments and the opinions which I entertain upon this question, I feel that I might do myself injustice in voting against this resolution without a very brief explanation of my vote.

In the first place, the resolution itself is rather of a dubious character. It involves two distinct propositions, the one in reference to the ministerial duty of the President of the Senate in counting the votes as tabulated by the tellers, and the other as to the judicial determination of what are votes themselves. Blended as they are, it makes it more difficult for me to vote on the resolution, because I entertain the opinion that the President of the Senate has the right under the Constitution to count the votes of the electors as they are returned from the States, upon the theory that there will be no contest; that under the provisions of the acts of Congress providing the machinery how these votes shall be authenticated, and there being single State governments in all the States, no question can arise as to which is the correct return, and therefore the counting of the votes in such a condition of things is a mere ministerial duty. I have long entertained that opinion; I have on more than one occasion enunciated it, and I have seen no reason in the long years that I have had occasion to look at it to change that early-formed opinion.

The framers of the Constitution when they sent it down to the States provided in their resolution for the first meeting of Congress, and used these words:

> That the electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of the President, and should transmit their votes, certified, signed, sealed, and directed as the Constitution requires, to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled; that the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned; that the Senators should appoint a president of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President.

Mr. Langdon was accordingly chosen President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving these votes, of opening these votes, and of counting these votes; and for years after that they were so opened, they were so received, they were so counted; and the President of the Senate gave his own certificate over his own hand that he had, in the presence of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, opened the votes, counted the votes, and certified to whomsoever the Presidency had gone by the election, and the Vice-Presidency in the same way. Then it ran on and a new system in part grew up, but not changing its character except in so far that a committee was subsequently appointed to advertise the gentlemen chosen to the offices of President and Vice-President of their election.

So it came down until 1868, so far as my knowledge of the proceedings is concerned, when I had the honor of holding a seat upon the floor of the Senate. The then dominant party, not recognizing the rights of certain of the Southern States, passed a joint resolution excluding from the electoral count those States, and declaring that they should have no part or lot in that count unless they had complied with certain prerequisites. That joint resolution went to the President of the United States. The President (the office being then held by Andrew Johnson) vetoed the joint resolution, and the veto came before the Senate with the joint resolution for consideration.

Mr. MORGAN. Did not Mr. Lincoln veto it?

Mr. WHYTE. No, sir. Mr. Johnson vetoed the joint resolution to which I refer. It was a previous joint resolution which Mr. Lincoln returned to Congress without his approval, upon the ground that he had nothing to do with it; and Mr. Johnson sent this joint resolution back to the Senate with his objections, to which I ask the attention of my brothers upon the floor on this side of the Chamber, because we stood here then a small band of democratic Senators, but eight in number, and every one of us voted to support the objections of the then President of the United States. This is his message:

> The mode and manner of receiving and counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States are in plain and simple terms prescribed by the Constitution. That instrument imperatively requires that the President of the Senate "shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." Congress has therefore no power under the Constitution, to receive the electoral votes or reject them. The whole power is exhausted, when, in the presence of the two Houses, the votes are counted and the result declared. In this respect the power and duty of the President of the Senate are, under the Constitution, purely ministerial. When, therefore, the joint resolution declares that no electoral votes shall be received or counted from States that since the 4th of March, 1867, have not "adopted a constitution of State government, under which a State government shall have organized," a power is assumed which is nowhere delegated to Congress, unless upon the assumption that the State governments organized prior to the 4th of March, 1867, were illegal and void.

The joint resolution, by implication, at least, concedes that these States were States by virtue of their organization prior to the 4th of March, 1867, but denies to them the right to vote in the election of President and Vice-President of the United States. It follows either that this assumption of power is wholly unauthorized by the Constitution, or that the States so excluded from voting were out of the Union by reason of the rebellion, and have never been legitimately restored. Being fully satisfied that they were never out of the Union, and that their relations thereto have been legally and constitutionally restored, I am forced to the conclusion that the joint resolution which deprives them of the right to have their votes for President and Vice-President received and counted, is in conflict with the Constitution, and that Congress has no more power to reject their votes than those of the States which have been uniformly loyal to the Federal Union.

When that message was received the question was put to the Senate, Shall the joint resolution be passed again, notwithstanding the objections of the President? As I said before, every democrat on this floor voted to sustain the objections of the President, and I will read their names, that my statement may not be questioned. Those who voted in the negative were Messrs. Buckalew, Garret Davis of Kentucky, Doolittle, Hendricks, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, Vickers, and WHYTE. So that long ago I was committed by vote, by judgment, to the belief that so far as the counting of the votes of electors was concerned, it was purely a ministerial duty on the part of the President of the Senate; that he had no power judicially to determine what States had the right to cast votes. I will admit, following the views of the great Chancellor Kent, that it is a casus omissus in the Constitution, and that before we do anything else it is our duty to pass a constitutional amendment to provide for that case which our fathers never dreamed could exist in this American Republic, of two returns from two State governments each claiming to be the lawful government of a State.

Therefore, Mr. President, with my view, with my record, I cannot vote for the resolution of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland finds himself unwilling to take his place on the record upon this resolution without an explanation, and I find myself unwilling to do the same thing without at least a word of reply to the observations which have fallen from the honorable Senator. It has been a part, if not of his purpose, of the effect of his remarks, to convict the democratic members of this body of inconsistency; and ardently as I feel for the interests of the democratic party, not being attorney of record for that historic organization——

Mr. WHYTE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. CONKLING. In the midst of this sentence?

Mr. WHYTE. I am the only remaining democratic Senator of that day in this body.

Mr. CONKLING. As the last leaf upon the tree; not as the last rose of summer, but as the rose of last summer, I wish to offer to the honorable Senator from Maryland, and I trust he will receive, my profound condolence. As was said of Napoleon, that honorable Senator is wrapped in the solitude of his own originality. He is the last of the Mohegans; the last of the Barons; the last of that long and historic line of statesmen who once belonged to the late democratic party; and I uncover in the presence of the sole representative of the pale memory of a thing that was.

Resuming, now, the remark in the midst of which the honorable Senator interrupted me, anxious as I am to preserve as an antiquity the past consistency of the democratic party, I do not feel myself authorized, standing in the presence of the distinguished Senator from Ohio and of so many others able and authorized to bear up the tattered democratic banner, or even to expostulate against the exposure made by the distinguished Senator from Maryland of the inconsistency of those who have followed that faded flag. I do not rise, therefore, to reply to that portion of the Senator's speech, but to dissent, as I do sharply although respectfully, from the argument or the sophistry—for that the honorable Senator must let me think it is—that the precedent he was pleased to cite proves anything in favor of his position. He goes back, not to the beginning of the Government, that would be lawyer-like, that would be a resort to a precedent on all fours and authentic; but he goes behind the existence of the Government; he goes to the prehistoric epoch, and displays to us a transaction begun, continued, and ended before the Constitution ever spoke; and from that he deduces the argument that now, proceeding under the Constitution and exemplifying it, we are inconsistent who depart, if we do depart, (which I shall deny in a moment,) from the precedent, as he calls it, established at a time when the Constitution was silent.

It has been my fortune to hear distinguished members of this body, those whose rank and service and consideration gave them privileges and liberties which do not pertain to me, read to the Senate what they themselves had said on past occasions. For the first time in my common-place experience, I venture upon such a presumption, and beg to read to the honorable Senator from Maryland in order to show, if nothing else, that I am at least consistent with myself, the view I took four years ago of the point which so cogently and with so much animation the Senator has presented. I said then and I say now of the counting of the electoral vote which chose George Washington President, which counting took place before there was a Constitution of the United States:

In the first place the whole proceeding antedated the Constitution; it was before it was ratified; it was before it was proposed. Geologists would say it was prehistoric. It was a prefatory, or provisional proceeding. In the language of the resolution, "proceedings were to be commenced under the said Constitution." The ship was to be launched, and the launch might be by the sails or the machinery of the vessel, or by external and imparted force. It might be, as the French would say, by an impulsion; and those who made the launch chose so to make it. The resolution did not profess to define or construe any clause in the Constitution. It merely designated an occasion, and referred to the objects of that occasion. It did not even profess to conform to the modes which the Constitution would bring in. The Constitution directed that the electors should send their certificates to the President of the Senate. This resolution suggested that they should be sent to the Secretary of the United States. Who was he? He was the Clerk of the old Continental Congress. They had but one House, and had a clerk, and this was the man. The resolution did not even propose that the counting should take place in the presence of the two Houses.

How did the Senate regard the action thus suggested?

George Washington had been unanimously chosen President. Every elector had voted for him. The electors themselves had been appointed with unanimity. Everybody from the beginning knew it would be so; it was a matter of course. John Adams had been overwhelmingly elected Vice-President. To ascertain the election was a substantial and solemn proceeding, only as it is substantial and solemn for the Secretary of State to announce the Fourth of July, or a holiday.

The time "to commence proceedings," according to the suggestion of the resolution, was March 4, 1789. Ten States had ratified the Constitution. A quorum of the Senate was 11. No quorum came to the seat of Government till April 6. Then no Senator was sworn in. It was January 3, 1790, before the oath of office was taken. Till then there was no Senate and no Senator, but only Senators-elect. Ten months before they were sworn in as Senators, and on the 6th of April, 1789, eleven of those who afterward became Senators proceeded to start the Government, and impart life and motion to the Constitution.

They passed an order. Here it is:

I am going to read it as the most emphatic and the briefest way of italicizing what I conceive to be, for the purpose now before us, its operative and distinguishing words:

Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States.

I suspend the reading to observe, that had the resolution stopped here it would certainly be open to the argument of the honorable Senator. Even then that argument in my opinion would be fallacious for several reasons but conspicuously for this: had the House of Representatives sent to the Senate articles of impeachment and had the Senate passed a resolution that the honorable Senator from Illinois should be elected President of the Senate for the sole purpose of trying that impeachment, that resolution in my judgment would not purport to divest the Senate of its function in that behalf. It would merely designate the Senator from Illinois to perform so much duty, to exert so much power, to incarnate so much of constitutional authority as resides in him who presides when the Senate tries an impeachment. Should the Governor of Maryland issue a commission addressed to one of the judges of a nisi prius court informing him that, reposing special trust and confidence in him, he was designated and appointed for the sole purpose of trying A B for murder, such order would convey to my mind the impression, and no other, that this justice of first instance—I know not the appellation in Maryland—this particular nisi prius judge was designated and appointed to go to that court of oyer and terminer, if so it be called in Maryland, and there, being there for that sole duty, proceed to try the culprit to be arraigned for the highest crime known to Maryland law; but it would not dismiss the jury; it would not abolish the common law; it would not overthrow the constitution of Maryland: it would perform no function except to designate, not somebody else, but the particular person, and him alone, to exercise all the faculties, to wield all the powers, to administer all the judicial faculty lodged in the presiding officer of such a trial and in such a court. So, should the honorable Senator from Rhode Island be, by an order of the Senate to-morrow, elected its presiding officer, for the sole purpose on Wednesday next, of counting the electoral votes, or conducting the count of electoral votes, or discharging (described by any other phraseology) that function, such an order of the Senate as I should understand it, would not, in the estimation of a hair, either add to or diminish the powers of the presiding officer of the Senate as those powers are found in the instrument, which is the warrant and the master of us all.

But the resolution did not stop there, so as to depend upon such an argument as I now present; it proceeded to declare:

And that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed in the presence of the House to discharge that duty.

What duty, I inquire of the honorable Senator from Maryland? If it were true that the presiding officer of the Senate, and he alone, were not only to bring in and display the certificates, not only to open the certificates, but to identify and verify and establish the votes, to adjudge whether they came from communities calling themselves States, and whether each of them was in fact a State, whether those certificates were forgeries or were genuine, in fine whether they had all the attributes and all the solemnities pre-requisite to votes, and then to declare their force and effect, to certify it—if it were true that the President of the Senate was "the be-all and the end-all" of the matter, the Aaron's rod swallowing all the prerogatives before the fact and after the fact and of the fact, I inquire what was that "duty" which the Senate was to proceed, in the presence of the House, to discharge? No duty save that of a spectator who witnesses a pageant?

I correct myself; not so substantial a duty as that, because they cannot even be witnesses. If the presiding officer of the Senate is to proceed to read, as I now read the pamphlet before me, in his seat, no matter who may be in this Chamber, or in any part of it while he does it, in no legal, effectual, I will add in no substantial sense, are those who sit here witnesses. Senators around me see me in the act of reading from this book. Whether I read from it truly or falsely, correctly or incorrectly, they have no more knowledge than the doorkeeper in the corridor or the members now in the other wing of the Capitol. Instead of being a duty to act as such witnesses, it would not even be a ceremonial; it would be the merest vain motion, as an Attorney-General, now gone, used to be fond of saying, it would be a mere mockery, the very derison of legal or practical proceeding. But the resolution does not yet stop:

And that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose.

And Mr. Ellsworth reported that he had delivered the message. Will the honorable Senator from Maryland tell me for what? If there was reposed with the President of the Senate as a single individual the power and the whole power to begin, continue, and conclude this transaction, for what purpose, nay under what permission of courtesy, I may say of decency, was the House of Representatives to appoint one or two men to sit at his elbow to peer over the thing he did? A judge on the bench sitting alone has the power to determine the issues of law and of fact before him. What would you think of the appointment by the order of somebody, of a tipstaff, a teller, a mentor, a sentinel, a watchman, a spy, an intruder to perch himself upon the bench and look over the judicial shoulder to ascertain whether the judge committed fraud, was guilty of a cheat by statute or at common law in the rendition of a decision or in his manipulation and declaration of a paper?

All this, Mr. President, is not, however, quite all. The light streams on this proceeding not from the resolution alone, but from what in the case of a diplomatic convention would be called the protocol, from what my astute and learned friend sometimes calls in another forum the res gestæ, the surrounding circumstances of the transaction itself as it was enacted in real life. The Houses came together; they counted these votes. George Washington had been chosen President, everybody had voted for the electors, and every elector had voted for George Washington. It was a solemnity to make the declaration, but it was the most formal and unnecessary solemnity that perhaps ever engaged a body of men. There was such a total absence of need to observe technical rules that it was quite natural that those who did it should observe the advice given by Lady Macbeth to her guests, to stand not upon the order of their going, but go at once. Under circumstances so full of invitation to disregard formality, on an occasion so obviously suggestive of the needlessness of adhering to formal observances, look and see what the two Houses did. After the certificates were opened; after the tellers had verified, tabulated, and reported; after the announcement had been made; after the Houses had separated, a committee was appointed to do what? I beg the attention of the honorable Senator to this, because I understood him to emphasize with somewhat of ponderous particularity the fact that John Langdon signed a certain certificate in which appeared certain recitals:

A committee was appointed to prepare the certificates of election. One of the committee was Mr. Ellsworth and he had sat in the constitutional convention. The committee drew the certificate, and every word of it, and the President of the Senate was directed to sign it, and he did sign it. He signed it not of his own motion, or because authorized by the Constitution, but by the command of the Senate speaking for both Houses, and he signed it as the organ and mouth-piece of the two Houses.

This reminds me that there is a missing link in my narrative as thus given, and I will now supply that link. There is in this pamphlet a memorandum of it which I will not stop to find but I will venture upon recollection to assert that Mr. Madison, then a member of the House, came to the Senate and stated to the Senate that by a resolution of the House he had been directed to come and inform the Senate that the House committed to the Senate the preparation of the certificate, the solemnization of the fact, and had directed him to say that the Senate might determine the persons—my recollection is that the message was in the plural—that the Senate might determine the persons by whom this certificate should be signed.

Mr. WHYTE. Will the Senator from New York allow me to correct him? I know that he is generally very accurate. The persons who were designated by the Senate under the consent of the House were the individual persons who were to carry Mr. Langdon's notification to those gentlemen. Mr. Langdon, if the Senator will read his certificate, certifies that he himself did open and count the votes.

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend leaps, if he will pardon me, before he comes to the stile or at least before I come to the stile. I shall not forget Mr. Langdon's certificate; I shall come to it in a moment. I am dealing with another point; but my friend's interruption has enabled me to fortify my recollection. I have found the very words in which the House declared itself. I will read them:

Mr. Madison came to the Senate to say that the House had directed him to inform the Senate that the House had agreed that the election should be certified or notified by such persons and in such manner as the Senate shall be pleased to direct.

My friend from Maryland is a lawyer and he is a well-taught and accomplished lawyer, and I should darken counsel by words were I to spend one moment in satisfying his mind that that message demonstrates that the House of Representatives directed that Mr. Madison should bear the message implying that they had the right and the power to designate any person or persons within their province whom they pleased to make this certificate upon the force and effect of which the honorable Senator has commented.

Mr. WHYTE. Now, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. WHYTE. The Senator is always very strong in what he states; but if he will look at the Senate's resolution, that the Senate immediately acted upon the notification of Mr. Madison—

Mr. CONKLING. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WHYTE. And "appointed Charles Thomson, esq., to notify George Washington, esq., of his election to the office of President of the United States of America; and Mr. Sylvanus Bourn to notify John Adams, esq., of his election to the office of Vice-President of the said United States." And these were the two messengers who were directed to carry Mr. Langdon's certificate to those gentlemen.

Mr. CONKLING. Does my friend mean that when the House gravely resolved and sent perhaps its most illustrious member to the Senate to bear its resolution, that the Senate might designate the persons to certify the result, it meant only that the Senate might name a messenger who should carry word to General Washington of what had been done?

Mr. WHYTE. That is the Journal of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no. If my honorable friend will loan me that Journal, I will undertake to demonstrate the fact——

Mr. WHYTE. It is the report of Mr. Gorham, Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. We shall see.

Mr. WHYTE. If you read the verbal message of Mr. Madison, you will see that right upon it the action of the Senate took place.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend will be sure that I shall read what he hands me and I shall do it without any teller to look over my shoulder to see that I read it correctly. Under the Constitution now, I have the sole power to read this page. That power resides with me, and, therefore, it would not be either appropriate or competent for the honorable Senator from Maryland or the whole Senate to raise a committee of pages or tellers or anybody else to come here and look over me to see that I do not garble or pervert these historic passages. There is a good deal I notice on this page that would be quite instructive, passages which escaped not the attention of the honorable Senator from Maryland, but which owing to the rule which denies time to Senators here to express themselves, my honorable friend from Maryland did not think it worth while to read. I do not find upon this Journal any certificate signed by Mr. Langdon. Does the Senator find it here?

Mr. WHYTE. Not there. It is in the volume of the electoral count.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I will not look in the book that does not contain it.

Mr. WHYTE. The message of Mr. Madison is in that book.

Mr. CONKLING. I will look at the other. Whom did the honorable Senator say was appointed to bear this message?

Mr. WHYTE. A man by the name of Thomson.

Mr. CONKLING. On the Journal I find this written by John Langdon:

SIR: The Senate of the United States have appointed you to wait on John Adams, esq., with a certificate of his being elected to the office of Vice-President of the United States—

Does the Senator from Maryland perceive anything in that reading which illuminates him? The Senate has appointed you to wait on John Adams with a certificate! That is the paper I am talking about; that is the paper Mr. Madison came to the Senate to talk about; that is the paper which he said the House had resolved that the Senate might direct who should sign; that is the paper which a committee raised by the Senate prepared; that is the paper which the Senate directed John Langdon to sign. And now comes my honorable friend from Maryland and he thinks that the House sent a message over here to say that the Senate might, after that was done, select anybody they pleased, either the Sergeant-at Arms, or anybody else they thought was a competent person in that regard, to go and carry that certificate to George Washington and to John Adams. I say to him that this very Journal says that they were even formal enough to put in writing the fact that Mr. Bourn was deputed to do what? To carry a certificate to John Adams. Mr. Bourn did not sign the certificate. It had been prepared by a committee of the Senate, a committee raised by the House and sent over here committing to the Senate the whole conclusion of the matter. That committee prepared the certificate, and the Senate directed John Langdon to sign it, and he did sign it, and then he gave the certificate to Mr. Bourn and gave him his credential saying to him that he was authorized to go and give that to Mr. Adams; and Mr. Thomson to give the certificate to General Washington.

Mr. President, I want now to advance the honorable Senator from Maryland one step in time if I can, and bring him to the occasion in 1805 when the electoral votes were counted. The men were there who met each other in the constitutional convention; the men were there who laid the keel of our Constitution and of our institutions; the men were there who building not in the gray twilight of the morning, but with the beams of many centuries streaming upon them, laid the foundations of the government under which we live. They were not only profoundly learned in the science and in the evils of government; they were not only sufferers and students of the imperfections of many systems of government, but they were masters of language, and so careful were they in the formation of the Government, that they gravely appointed a committee on style, on style alone. Such a committee now would be deemed finical, nay, it would be absurd, because all that comes from the statesmen of this epoch is sufficiently terse, sufficiently polished, sufficiently perfect to require no revising hand. But in that day they were more careful. The men who were thus careful and thus equipped for their work were on the stage in 1805. Among these men was Aaron Burr, never distinguished for the symmetry of his character, but conspicuously eminent always for two masterful faculties, one the keenness of his intellect, the other the intrepidity of his character. He was the presiding officer of the Senate. He was not coy or bashful. He was not a man to shrink from responsibility, opportunity, or prerogative. He was not a man to belittle, even if he did not magnify his office. To him, on the occasion I now refer to, the Constitution spoke in the ordinance requiring the President of the Senate to receive, keep, bring in, and open the certificates; and although not addressed by the Constitution, he was the person observing the Constitution in those other words which, turning their back upon the presiding officer, declare "and the votes shall then be counted." How did Aaron Burr understand, how did he interpret, and expound? How did all the members of both of the Houses receive and sanction the interpretation of this clause of the Constitution? Mr. Burr stated—

That pursuant to law there had been transmitted to him several packets, which, from the indorsements upon them, appeared to be the votes of the electors of a President and Vice-President; that the returns forwarded by mail, as well as the duplicates sent by special messengers, had been received by him in due time.

And then he said that to which I ask the attention of the Senator from Maryland. Addressing the assembled members of both the Houses, Mr. Burr said:

You will now proceed, gentlemen, said he, to count the votes as the Constitution and laws direct, adding that, perceiving no cause for preference in the order of opening the returns, he would pursue a geographical arrangement, beginning with the Northern States.

The certificate had been signed by John Langdon; the Journal of the Senate bore the order appointing John Langdon; all the lights and shadows which fall upon the page to-day were freshly visible then. Aaron Burr was an astute lawyer, he was very largely taught in the science and in the realities of the Government of which he was an officer. He was speaking, eye to eye, before the face of the very men, many of them, who sat in the constitutional convention or in the State conventions explained and carried it and who everywhere in the forum of discussion had been accepted as the students, the expounders, the masters of the meaning of the Constitution; and yet he, speaking to them and speaking that the nation might hear, conducting this occasion while yet it was a novelty; before it had become by frequent recurrence the familiar thing which now it is, said to the two Houses:

You will now proceed, gentlemen, to count the votes as the Constitution and laws direct.

One would suppose that a man so acute as Burr, a man having so much of the pride of appearance, a man standing as he did in so conspicuous a tableau to be looked upon not only then but as we see it now from a long thereafter, would have been circumspect when he came to write his name solemnly and officially upon a paper which was to survive among the archives of the Government. What certificate did he sign? The same certificate which had been signed by John Langdon. Can any man suppose that Burr, in the teeth of his own declaration, in utter repugnance of the public and conspicuous fact, in denial of the recorded truth that the two Houses and their tellers had done what he proffered them to do, signed a certificate which he understood to mean that he (Burr) not only absorbed and possessed in legal theory but that in point of fact he had arrogated and assumed to himself and had actually exerted and performed this function and the whole of it?

Mr. WHYTE. Now, will the Senator from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, yes.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask whether after the tellers had made a tabulation of the votes it was not handed to Mr. Burr to be examined by him, and whether he did not then declare that it was his duty to state that Thomas Jefferson had been elected President of the United States; whether he did not himself assume that it was his duty to make the declaration on that occasion and that it was his count by that declaration?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the law has a maxim which has become a principle that, the presumption is that all public officers do their duty; and proceeding upon that presumption, without resorting either to memory or to history, I am prepared to say that Aaron Burr did what the honorable Senator now ascribes to him. It was once an honor conferred upon me by a presiding officer of the Senate now no more to act as teller on the part of the Senate when an illustrious citizen had been chosen to the presidential office. On that occasion there were disputed votes. On that occasion there was tumult and disorder in the House. On that occasion violence of controversy distinguished the declaration of the count. On that occasion the two Houses separated, and each for itself pronounced, and pronounced finally, whether votes should or should not be counted. On that occasion no man dissented, not one; and on that occasion the jaded ingenuity of no late brother, anxious to distinguish the occasion by some novelty of his, ever suggested that the President of the Senate had anything more to do with deciding the questions that arose than the Sultan of Turkey or the man in the moon. And yet it was my duty, as I thought, as teller, in the midst of a raging din, to read to the presiding officer of the two Houses the result of the vote as I found it to be, and the presiding officer thought it was his duty to do exactly that which in the form of a question to me the Senator from Maryland asserts was done by the presiding officer in 1805. No doubt of it, but had the presiding officer asserted or implied all that the honorable Senator imputes to him now, it would have been the veriest travesty, the veriest mockery, the most insolent and outlandish burlesque upon the whole proceeding.

The idea that Mr. Wade, as President of the Senate, after coming at the head of the Senate repeatedly along the corridors into this Chamber and then walking back again at the head of the Senate and announcing what the Senate had decided, he having had nothing on earth to do with it except that which you, sir, at this moment have to do with the very imperfect argument that I am making, namely, to be doomed to sit there and hear it, I say had Mr. Wade, after all that and after himself announcing and ratifying the propriety and efficacy of these proceedings, made a declaration in the presence of the same men, who knew it to be ridiculously false, that he, of himself, upon his ipse dixit had decided a question upon which as President of the Senate he never voted even,—I say had he done that, it would have been the very blasphemy of falsehood and absurdity. If Mr. Wade voted upon these questions, he voted qua his Senatorship, and not because he was presiding officer.

Mr. THURMAN. In 1873 Mr. Colfax, who was President of the Senate, on the occasion of the count did not vote at all on any question.

Mr. CONKLING. Precisely, just at the lord-chancellor of England may vote if he is a member of the Lords, not because he is lord-chancellor but because he votes qua his peerage because a member of the House; and as my honorable friend from Ohio reminds me, when Mr. Colfax, not a member of the body but its presiding officer by the ordinance of the Constitution, presided at the count of the electoral votes, he did not even vote, he did not even exert the aliquot part of power pertaining to a single member of a body composed of seventy-six members.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to remind him there, we decided on the votes of no less than three States on that occasion? Georgia voted for Greeley after he was dead and then there was an argument on the question whether the returns of Arkansas were certified under the proper seal. The two Houses decided all those questions.

Mr. CONKLING. I well remember it, Mr. President. I remember that we not only did it, but we did it under a rule which in its infinite wisdom and goodness declared that we should not even debate, and, accordingly, when a filed objection,—filed while the two Houses were together, which objection compelled them instantly to separate and each to proceed to consider it—stated that in the case of Arkansas the great seal of the State had not been affixed to the commission, so sedate and contemplative was the proceeding, so proper was it, so free from being summary or arbitrary, that, without debate, the Senate proceeded to decide that the vote of Arkansas should not be counted at all, because the governor of the State had affixed the executive seal as distinguished from the great seal of the Commonwealth to the paper which the Vice-President had received. And when this solemn proceeding had concluded, when the announcement had been made, when the vote had been forever discarded, when the decision had become forever final as it was unchallenged by any member, some bookworm of the Senate went into the library of the Senate and discovered that there was no seal in Arkansas save only that seal which had been appended to the certificate; and thus Arkansas as she could not have been had my astute and ever sleepless friend [Mr. GARLAND] whom I see now with a sagacious expression of face, been here, was deprived of all voice whatsoever in the great question pending, because of ignorance on the part of the Senate in respect of her seal. Does not my honorable friend from Maryland know that had this power been reposed in the presiding officer he would undoubtedly have understood all about these seals and would have decided otherwise?

Mr. WHYTE. We were working then under the joint rule.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, we were, and that brings me to notice another argument made by the honorable Senator from Maryland. Before doing that, however, I wish to refer to the many contests we had beginning with that over the vote of Missouri. There was one over Indiana because it was said Indiana had cast out her shoe over certain territory not belonging to her, and her vote was challenged and litigated and decided, never by the presiding officer, but by the two Houses acting separately and comparing their views together. After the Missouri case, after the Indiana case, after the Michigan case, after repeated instances had occurred, the question to be decided going to the very root of the validity of an electoral certificate, no Vice-President ever having proposed to take part in it, ever having hinted that he had the power over the question,—after such instances time after time had occurred, this very immemorial, venerable, formal certificate which, under the direction specifically given at the time by the two Houses John Langdon signed, continued to be the form which all presiding officers employed. Does my friend from Maryland think that it would be either convincing or lawyer-like to cite the form or the formality of these after-coming certificates in order to overthrow the notorious, historical, incontestable fact that the Vice-President performed no function whatever in respect of these decisions, did not participate in them, but that they were made wholly by the majority of the one House and of the other?

I come now to speak of that which I should have forgotten but for the remark of the honorable Senator from Maryland that we were proceeding under a joint rule. The honorable Senator said that his view was like that of the illustrious Chancellor Kent. Mr. President, the honorable Senator and I contend at this moment for the robes and scepter of Chancellor Kent. I say Chancellor Kent never intimated such an opinion as the honorable Senator has stated. Chancellor Kent, speaking to the sons of men of wealth, speaking in Columbia College to young gentlemen to whom he said that a knowledge of the law would be not only useful but ornamental; speaking after he had left the bench, speaking in the colloquial, and I think I may say inexact language in which the greatest of jurists might have addressed students in the law, said, "I presume in the absence of all legislative provision"—I stop there without concluding the sentence; I choose to stop, leaving it imperfect, in order to commend to the honorable Senator from Maryland those words without any others. "I presume." I will not dwell upon that. That is not the language in which he was wont when he was on the bench to deliver judgments. It is a remark; it is a guess; it is an observation. It is not the calm, deliberate, final language of judicial judgment; far from it. I throw that away, and ask the honorable Senator what he does with these words uttered by this great publicist and patriot, "in the absence of all legislative provision?" Does any man believe that he who wrote Kent's Commentaries did not know the futility, the absurdity, the usurpation, the violence done to reason, of talking about legislative provisions to transplant from one place to another or to impair in any manner functions created and deposited by the Constitution? "In the absence of all legislative provision." If the honorable Senator from Maryland is right, if the Constitution nominates the President of the Senate and reposes in him exclusively the right, the duty, and the power to count, in the broad and many-sided sense of that word, electoral votes, in the name of the law, which the Senator from Maryland reverences, I ask him what legislative provision, or what the absence of legislative provision could have to do with the question? The Constitution says the President of the United States shall be commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy. What would you think of Chancellor Kent, what would you think of the Master of the Rolls, what would you think of a clerk in a law office who would gravely say in public, "in the absence of all legislative provision I presume the President of the United States is commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy," or, as my friend from Ohio suggests, "has the veto power?"

Does not the honorable Senator from Maryland see that when dealing with the language of Chancellor Kent he finds those words, he gives up his argument in so far as those words prevail? Does he not see that their employment is irreconcilably hostile to the idea that Chancellor Kent believed that the Constitution had ordained that the presiding officer of the Senate was to have the jus disponendi of electoral votes? I say again to the honorable Senator that he and I contend in argument for the robes and scepter of Chancellor Kent. His language proves all that I maintain, namely that in some form—I will not now, admonished by the dial, venture upon the particulars—either by an exertion of the law-making power, (of course, by means of a statute to be signed by the Executive as well as adopted by the two Houses,) or by the concurrent action of the two Houses, or in some way these two bodies have the control, the duty, the function in this behalf. This is manifest in so far as the opinion of Chancellor Kent can manifest it from those words found in one of his lectures delivered at Columbia College. Never in the freedom of a chat with young men, never in the unstudied expression of his views to a law class, never in any moment however unguarded or listless, could the great chancellor, the great commentator, the great master of style, and the great master of the science of the law, have talked about the intervention of legislative provisions to add to or take from, or in any way change, a deposition of a high power made by the Constitution in one single official. It is incredible.

So, Mr. President, as I understand it, the whole history of the Government, the judgment of both Houses, the action in every instance of the Houses, the absence of all action by the presiding officer, the comments and exposition of a long line of lawyers and statesmen of all political parties, stand in flat contradiction to the idea that the President of the Senate can decide whether a State alleged to be, is or is not a State, can decide whether a State in voting upon a day not named in the law has or has not effectually voted, or can decide any other matter or thing on which may hinge the ascertainment or the declaration of a presidential result.

I beg pardon of the Senate for traversing all this ground. It is a somewhat old story; it has few attractions for me; but after the remarks of a Senator of so much reputation as the Senator from Maryland, a Senator held, and justly held, in so high esteem as a member of the profession which he adorns and which so long he has successfully practiced, I was unwilling that the precedent he cited, the language of Chancellor Kent, and the other incidents which he drew to his argument, should be narrated and marshaled as if they disproved and refuted the position which now and sometimes heretofore I have endeavored to maintain, and for which I must vote whenever presented in a resolution to which it is my duty to respond.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. THURMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not expect to vote on the resolution, inasmuch as I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] I do not know how he would vote, and I shall decline to vote on it. I will, however, say a word with reference to it inasmuch as I cannot put myself on the record by voting.

If the resolution means that it is not in the power of the President of the Senate to tabulate and perform a simple ministerial duty in counting the electoral votes, so far as that means counting the electoral votes, then I am opposed to the resolution. If it means, on the other hand, that the President of the Senate cannot pass upon the validity of a vote, cannot act judicially, then I am in favor of the resolution. But in the very language of the resolution as it is now put I am not in favor of it at all, because it is uncertain to me what the mover of the resolution means. I think, as the Senator from Maryland said, the simple matter of tabulating the vote is within the power of the Vice-President.

The Senator from Maryland called the attention of the Senate to the fact that in 1789 a President of the Senate was elected for the sole purpose of counting the electoral votes. I find by an examination of the Journal that in 1793 the Senate informed the House that they had elected a President pro tempore for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes; so that at least twice this body has elected an officer for that express purpose. I find that at least half a dozen times the Senate by the direct order of the body has adopted a notification as follows: That the underwritten as Vice-President or as President pro tempore of the Senate, has opened the votes and counted them; and those have passed upon the yeas and nays being called upon them, by a majority on one or two occasions. So I do not think it can be successfully said in this body or anywhere else that the President of the Senate has not repeatedly tabulated the votes and counted them. In that view, if the resolution means that he cannot do that, I am against the resolution. If the resolution means that he cannot act judicially and cannot determine what is the vote, if a plural vote comes up from a State, then I am in favor of the principle.

But I am opposed to the resolution now because it has not been to any committee; it has not been considered. It presents a question of the very gravest importance, and one upon which the very best men in the Senate may differ. It is a question that has been discussed heretofore a great deal, and it ought to be discussed a good deal more before the Senate puts itself on record as to what is the law or what is not.

I am opposed to the resolution again for the reason that it will amount to nothing when we shall have passed it. When we have said that this is the judgment of the Senate if the House concurs, for that is the resolution, if the House does concur, it amounts to nothing at all. I believe that it is the duty of the Senate to put its judgment in a law, and put it in such a position that when it becomes the rule it will remain the rule until it shall be withdrawn by the methods provided by the Constitution for the repeal of an enactment; and because I so feel, while I do not propose to vote upon this resolution, if I could vote upon it I should vote in the negative.

Mr. INGALLS. This resolution involves, to my mind, two propositions, one of which I am in favor of and the other of which I am opposed to. I believe that the Vice-President of the United States, or the President of the Senate, has the right to count the votes in the sense of mere computation—but that he has the right to determine between conflicting returns what votes shall be counted or what votes shall be rejected, I deny. In order to separate these two propositions in the resolution, I move to amend by striking out the word "not" after the word "is" and before "invested" in the second line of the resolution, and by striking out the words "so as" before the words "to determine," in the last line but one, and inserting the words "but not;" so that the resolution, if amended, will read:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President of the Senate is invested by the Constitution of the United States with the right to count the votes of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, but not to determine what votes shall be received and counted or what votes shall be rejected.

If the resolution can be so amended as to separate these two propositions and make them distinct and unmistakable, I am willing to vote for it; but in its present shape I shall be compelled to vote against it. In order that these two propositions may be separated, I move the adoption of the amendment that I have suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. BLAINE. I have not enjoyed the privilege of hearing the discussion to-day, and I rise to ask a question. Does the resolution come from the Judiciary Committee of the Senate?

Mr. EATON. No, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. Does it come from the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. EATON. It comes from an individual member of the Senate, Mr. MORGAN, of Alabama.

Mr. BLAINE. The chairman of a caucus possibly.

Mr. EATON. Sir?

Mr. BLAINE. Representing the democratic sentiment possibly in an independent committee.

Mr. EATON. I have not said any such thing, and the Senator not being a member of any such caucus ought not to say so.

Mr. BLAINE. I qualified it by saying "possibly."

I think, Mr. President, that the resolution would meet the wishes of men who want to look at both sides of this question if it would just declare who can count the votes, and if then those who support it would tell the particular object of making this negation on the Vice-President's power at this time, when nobody is asserting it and there is no particular necessity on anybody to deny it. I do not think for myself that the honorable Senator from Alabama merely wishes upon an individual motion of his own to divide the Senate and prolong it at this critical and late period of the session for an abstract declaration of this kind, which was argued down on both sides four years ago; and I do not think he ought to do it without being willing to put into his resolution a declaration which shall have just as far a reach as that does, as to who shall count the votes and what shall be the authority competent to reject. The honorable Senator has given great attention to the subject; he is an able lawyer; is he prepared to state on the floor of the Senate who, in his judgment, should reject or count the votes?

Mr. MORGAN. I will say to the honorable Senator from Maine that the Senate to-day declined by a vote to go into that question.

Mr. BLAINE. Declined to go into it? Why, the Senate is in it now. It is perfectly within the power of the honorable Senator to do so when we are considering a mere declaratory resolution which is aimed at nothing in particular but a shot in the air, a mere declaratory resolution which might just as well be an attack upon the Copernican system. There is nobody here asserting the right; there is nobody here who attempts the exercise of it; and therefore a resolution of this kind cannot be quite fair, in perfect candor, without a declaration of both sides of it. It is in that spirit that I ask the honorable Senator from Alabama, for he is a very frank man, to amend his resolution in order that we shall have a comprehensive declaration. If the democratic party of the Senate of the United States is laying down a rule which shall be applicable to years after 1881, let us know the whole of the rule.

Mr. THURMAN. Does not the Senator know the whole of it, or enough of it?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not.

Mr. THURMAN. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I mean that the Senator from Maine should not be in doubt of the opinion of the Senator from Alabama or of a majority of the Senate, in view of the fact that we passed a concurrent resolution by a decided majority, I think nearly every democrat voting for it, or every one, and sent it to the House; and if the Senator will only work on his friends there it will become the rule and will govern the count, and we shall know not only what the Senator from Alabama thinks, but what he himself thinks.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator refer to the resolution which passed the Senate yesterday?

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; I refer to the rule that was passed at the last session, in May, and which certain things have prevented from passing in another place, to which I cannot allude.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the honorable Senator go further, as long as he is upon his feet, and tell me, for I ask for information, just what that rule was?

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator will find that it was taken mainly, I might almost say bodily, from the bill of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BLAINE. In a word, was it that both branches of Congress or either should decide a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Both of them.

Mr. BLAINE. That it took both Houses to reject a vote?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, in the case of a single return.

Mr. BLAINE. And in the case of a double return?

Mr. THURMAN. Then that the vote should be counted if both Houses agreed to count it.

Mr. BLAINE. Then why is not the Senator, when he is making a negation on one side, willing to put upon the record what the affirmation shall be? Why leave it loose for future contingencies that either rule may be adopted which may apply to a particular case that may arise?

Mr. THURMAN. That is already provided for; we have already passed it.

Mr. BLAINE. If it had not been so often quoted on the honorable Senator I should say, "That won't do."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Let it be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. I have only one word to say upon the amendment. There is not a single word in the Constitution of the United States that invests the President of the Senate with any such power. As the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has well said, after saying that the President of the Senate shall open the certificates in the presence of the two Houses, the Constitution, to use the vigorous phrase of the Senator from New York, turns its back on the President of the Senate and goes on to say, "and the vote shall then be counted." That is all it is; and he never did count the vote; and he never will count it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the passage of the resolution. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired on all questions to-day with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCDONALD, (when the name of Mr. VOORHEES was called.) My colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] is paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] was called away from the Chamber and I agreed to pair with him.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. My colleague [Mr. BROWN] is paired on political questions with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] As I believe this is not a political question, as it now stands, I will consent to release my colleague from the pair that the Senator from Colorado may vote.

Mr. WALLACE. I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. INGALLS. I omitted to state when the name of my colleague [Mr. PLUMB] was called, that he is paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.]

Mr. TELLER. If this were not a political question I might vote, but all day it has been treated as a political question by the umpire. Therefore I shall not vote.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nay 1; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask that the names of those who have not voted be called.

Mr. BLAINE. Under what rule is that request made?

Mr. THURMAN. No quorum having voted, the next thing to be done is to call the absentees.

Mr. BLAINE. That is a very different question, indeed. It is a request I never heard made before in the Senate, that the names of those not voting should be called. The honorable Senator will please have the rule read under which he asks that to be done.

Mr. THURMAN. They are presumably absent, because it is to be presumed that every Senator will discharge his duty. The rule requires every Senator to vote or to ask to be excused and to give his reasons for asking to be excused. I say, therefore, that it is not only right under the rule, but it has been the uniform practice; and then when it is found out, if it should be the case, that Senators are here who will not obey the rule of the Senate in respect to voting, it will be for the Senate to decide what shall be done.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to ask if it is not the case that when, in the orderly proceedings of the Senate, the lack of a quorum is disclosed, the only thing in order is to adjourn or to have a call of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that the precedents are that the roll is to be called again for the names of absentees.

Mr. McDONALD. Undoubtedly. These gentlemen ought to have a chance to vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Chair read the rule.

Mr. BLAINE. I should be glad to be informed of the rule before the Chair enforces that order. I should like to have the rule read, if it be in order, under which that is to be done.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether he did not himself just now raise the question of the presence of a quorum, by announcing that no quorum was present as he announced the number of the vote. If that be true, does not the second rule operate upon that condition of things?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is perfectly clear.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, is it too late to vote now? I was simply out of the Chamber for a moment during the call, and I ask that I may be allowed to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator cannot vote now. The result of the vote has been declared.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask that the roll be called in pursuance of Rule 2.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have moved to adjourn, which I think is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. Now I ask for a call of the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The second rule of the Senate is that—

If either at the commencement of any daily session of the Senate, or at any time during its daily sessions, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the Presiding Officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll of Senators, and shall announce the result to the Senate; and these proceedings shall be without debate.

The Chair therefore directs the call of the roll of Senators.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Anthony, | Davis of Illinois, | Johnston, | Ransom, |
| Baldwin, | Davis of W. Va., | Jonas, | Rollins, |
| Bayard, | Dawes, | Jones of Florida, | Saulsbury, |
| Beck, | Eaton, | Jones of Nevada, | Saunders, |
| Blaine, | Edmunds, | Kernan, | Slater, |
| Blair, | Farley, | Kirkwood, | Teller, |
| Booth, | Garland, | Lamar, | Thurman, |
| Bruce, | Groome, | Logan, | Vance, |
| Burnside, | Hampton, | McDonald, | Vest, |
| Butler, | Harris, | McMillan, | Walker, |
| Call, | Hereford, | McPherson, | Wallace, |
| Cameron of Wis., | Hill of Georgia, | Morgan, | Whyte, |
| Cockrell, | Hill of Colorado, | Pendleton, | Windom. |
| Coke, | Hoar, | Platt, | |
| Conkling, | Ingalls, | Pugh, | |

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators are present, being a quorum.

Mr. WHYTE. Now the vote is to be taken again.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask that the following rule be enforced:

When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present, each Senator when his name is called shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly, and without debate, his assent or dissent to the question.

I ask that those Senators who were present, whom the call shows to have been present when the yeas and nays were taken, be now called.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope before any action is taken the Senate will hear the seventeenth rule read, which provides that all these methods for enforcing a senatorial vote shall be taken before the announcement of the result. The vote has already been declared.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask that the vote be taken again. The question now before the Senate is, Shall the resolution pass?

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that the Senate adjourn, and I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES, (when his name was called.) I am paired, as I have already stated, for the afternoon, on all questions of this character, with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) If I were not paired, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 19, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—19.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Anthony, | Bruce, | Edmunds, | McMillan, |
| Baldwin, | Burnside, | Hill of Colorado, | Rollins, |
| Blaine, | Cameron of Wis., | Hoar, | Saunders, |
| Blair, | Conkling, | Jones of Nevada, | Windom. |
| Booth, | Davis of Illinois, | Kellogg, | |

NAYS—31.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Bayard, | Garland, | Jones of Florida, | Saulsbury, |
| Butler, | Groome, | Kernan, | Slater, |
| Call, | Hampton, | Lamar, | Thurman, |
| Cockrell, | Harris, | McDonald, | Vance, |
| Coke, | Hereford, | McPherson, | Vest, |
| Davis of W. Va., | Hill of Georgia, | Morgan, | Walker, |
| Eaton, | Johnston, | Pendleton, | Whyte. |
| Farley, | Jonas, | Pugh, | |

ABSENT—26.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Allison, | Ferry, | Morrill, | Teller, |
| Bailey, | Grover, | Paddock, | Voorhees, |
| Beck, | Hamlin, | Platt, | Wallace, |
| Brown, | Ingalls, | Plumb, | Williams, |
| Cameron of Pa., | Kirkwood, | Randolph, | Withers. |
| Carpenter, | Logan, | Ransom, | |
| Dawes, | Maxey, | Sharon, | |

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN. I am satisfied, from the condition that we are in this evening in the Chamber, that it is probably impossible to dispose of the resolution to-day. I think it is due to the democrats, who are paired with republicans on the other side, that they should at least be relinquished from their pairs, in order to make a quorum and thereby save time in the transaction of the public business. That is all we desire to do; but inasmuch as there seems to be an indisposition of that kind, inasmuch as there seems to be no disposition here to allow democrats to vote, we having a quorum here and able to carry the measure if we were not under the obligation of pairs, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 3, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

BUSINESS BY UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask by unanimous consent to introduce a proposition touching the order of business in the House, for reference to the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the remainder of the present session sixty minutes shall be set apart each day immediately following the "morning hour," or upon its suspension, during which Members and Delegates shall have an opportunity to ask for unanimous consent to consider and pass bills. The roll of States shall be called and members recognized in the order thereof. Each Member or Delegate shall have but one opportunity to ask for such consent until after all other members have been called; nor shall debate on any one bill exceed five minutes. This order may be suspended upon the same conditions as the "morning hour."

There was no objection, and the resolution was received and referred to the Committee on Rules.

ANNUAL REPORTS OF THE BUREAU OF ETHNOLOGY.

Mr. BLACKBURN, by unanimous consent, presented the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 15,000 copies each of the second and third annual reports of the Director of the Bureau of Ethnology of the Smithsonian Institution, with the necessary illustrations; 7,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 5,000 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO NORTH AMERICAN ETHNOLOGY.

Mr. BLACKBURN also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 6,000 copies each of volumes 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 of Contributions to North American Ethnology uniformly with the preceding volumes of the series, with the necessary illustrations; 3,000 of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 for the use of the Senate, and 2,000 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

Mr. BRIGHAM. I ask by unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the first section of Rule XI be amended so that the first clause and section shall read as follows:

"All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, namely:

"Subjects relating to the election of members; to the Committee on Elections, with whom all papers and records in contested cases must be filed within ten days after the announcement of said committee by the Speaker: Provided, That ninety days shall have elapsed since the service of the answer of the contestee on the contestant as required by law; otherwise such papers and records shall be filed with said committee immediately after the expiration of said ninety days if Congress be in session; if not, immediately after the opening of the next succeeding session.

"The committee shall proceed at once to the consideration of such contested cases in the order of their submission, holding daily sessions, and shall present their reports thereon in the order of consideration to the House within thirty days from the time of filing said papers and records.

"Said reports shall receive the consideration and final action of the House to the exclusion of all other business."

Mr. O'NEILL. Just one word about that. I want to make this suggestion——

Mr. BRIGHAM. I hope the House will give me a single moment to state a fact.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the resolution?

Mr. BLAND. I object unless it be referred.

Mr. BRIGHAM. But a moment. If the organization of this House was effected at all, it was effected on the 18th of March, 1879; but, sir, as we all know——

Mr. BLAND. I object to debate, and will object to the resolution unless it be referred without debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the reference of the resolution, and it is accordingly referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to move an amendment to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not before the House for amendment.

Mr. BRIGHAM. I wish to move instructions to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Nor is it before the House for instructions. It has been referred to the Committee on Rules.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF BATTLE ON GROTON HEIGHTS.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask by unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 5097) appropriating money toward the expense to be incurred in the centennial celebration of the battle on Groton Heights, and for other purposes, and that the same be now put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the battle of Groton Heights was one of the closing events of the American Revolution, preceding the final surrender of the British forces at Yorktown, in Virginia, only one month and thirteen days, and is logically and historically connected with that great event; and

Whereas the State of Connecticut has already commenced preparations for the centennial celebration of this battle, the massacre attendant upon the capture of Fort Griswold, and the burning of New London—all scenes in the bloody drama of September 6, 1781; and

Whereas the people of the other States of the Union, proud of the part which their fathers took in achieving American Independence, and actuated by the feeling of a common brotherhood, must desire to unite with the people of Connecticut in paying a proper tribute to the patriotism, dauntless courage, and heroic sacrifice of the noble band of men who fought valiantly against superior numbers of British troops, and chose death rather than surrender their homes to the brutality and lust of the invaders: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by the centennial committee of the Groton Monument Association, under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the purpose of aiding to defray the expenses which will be incurred in celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the battle and massacre at Fort Griswold, on Groton Heights, and the burning of New London, on the 6th day of September, 1781, in such manner as shall befit the historical significance of that event, and be indicative of the present power, prosperity, and greatness of the United States as a nation.

SEC. 2. That the further sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of thoroughly repairing the granite monument erected in 1826, on Groton Heights, and to be disbursed under the direction of the Groton Monument Association.

SEC. 3. That the centennial committee of the Groton Monument Association are hereby authorized to enter upon and use the battle-field on Groton Heights at such times and in such manner as may be necessary for the centennial services.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. The Chair desires to state that the Committee on Military Affairs reported unanimously in favor of this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH PUBLIC LANDS IN RICHMOND COUNTY, N. Y.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6229) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through certain lands of the United States, in Richmond County, New York, and ask that the same be put upon its passage. This bill has the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to giving unanimous consent for the further consideration of any of these measures at this time. A resolution has been introduced and submitted to the Committee on Rules by which business may be reached in a regular way. I must object.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS TO SOLDIERS' HOMES.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing in reference to Senate bill No. 1573.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 4837 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed and re-enacted to read as follows: "The Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall cause to be sent to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, at Dayton, in Ohio, at Augusta, Maine, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Hampton, in Virginia, and the soldiers' home at Knightstown Springs, near Knightstown, in Indiana, each one copy of each of the following documents: The Journals of each House of Congress at each and every session, all laws of Congress, the annual messages of the President, with accompanying documents, the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and all other documents or books which may be printed and bound by order of either House of Congress. And the Public Printer is hereby authorized and directed to furnish to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives the documents referred to in this section."

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Printing have considered the accompanying bill (S. No. 1573) and respectfully report the same back to the House without amendment and recommend that the same do pass. The change proposed in existing law by the bill simply includes the daily edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD among the documents to be furnished the institutions named, and authorizes the Public Printer to supply the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House with facilities to comply with the law.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION FOR 1880.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I desire also to report from the Committee on Printing the following Senate concurrent resolution referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 15,560 copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1880 be printed; that 2,500 of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 6,060 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 7,000 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. HAYES. The committee recommend the adoption of this resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NEW DISCOVERIES IN FISH-CULTURE.

Mr. HAYES. I desire also to report from the Committee on Printing the joint resolution (H. R. No. 372) authorizing the Public Printer to print reports of the United States Fish Commissioner upon new discoveries in regard to fish-culture, with amendments.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, instructed to print and stereotype, from time to time, any matter furnished him by the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries relative to new observations, discoveries, and applications connected with fish-culture and the fisheries, to be capable of being distributed in parts, and the whole to form an annual volume or bulletin not exceeding five hundred pages. The extra edition of said work shall consist of 5,000 copies, of which 2,500 shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 for the use of the Senate, and 1,500 for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Printing having considered the accompanying resolution (H. R. No. 372) report the same back to the House with the following amendments: "In line 4, after the words 'from time to time,' insert the following: 'the regular number of 1,900 copies of.' In line 10 strike out the word 'extra.' In the same line, after the word 'said,' insert the word 'annual.'"

With these amendments the committee recommend that the resolution do pass.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

DISTRIBUTION OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing in reference to House joint resolution No. 377 providing for the distribution of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to the representatives of foreign governments in Washington, District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the Public Printer to mail one copy of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as the same may be printed, to each of the representatives of foreign governments in the city of Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Printing recommend the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to ask if that resolution comes in by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that this is a matter touching the privilege of the Committee on Printing under the rules to report at any time.

Mr. REAGAN. If it carries unanimous consent, then I must object.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter of courtesy to the representatives of foreign governments here, and is as high as a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that this is a matter which comes within the privileges allowed to the Committee on Printing to report.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I regret that circumstances make it necessary for me to ask the indulgence of this House, even for a few moments, to speak to a question of privilege.

In the daily RECORD of the 1st instant, there appears a speech purporting to have been delivered by Hon. HORATIO BISBEE, jr., of Florida, in the House of Representatives, Saturday, January 29, 1881. In that speech, and on the eighth page of that issue of the RECORD, Mr. BISBEE is reported to have said: "In this congressional district," (meaning the first district of Florida,) "in 1878, the names of republican voters were corruptly stricken from the registration books and their votes were refused or destroyed by fraud to the extent of 3,000; and thus two democratic congressmen were counted in and certified elected, from the State of Florida—and one of them still occupies a seat on this floor."

Mr. KEIFER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEIFER. I think that it has been disclosed, from what the gentleman has already said, that there is no attack upon him.

Mr. DAVIDSON. You have not heard me yet.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman says there is an attack upon him, of course the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Just hear me through, if you please.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman insists there is a direct attack upon him, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I beg the gentleman to permit me to proceed and he will see that I am making a personal explanation, which I am entitled to make under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has stated that he rose to make a personal explanation.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman says there is an attack upon him, of course I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. DAVIDSON. The gentleman goes on to say, "neither of whom had any more right to it than the captain of a privateer has to the plunder which his piratical crew have captured and stolen from their innocent and helpless victims." Had these words, Mr. Speaker, been uttered in this House, I think that I should have heard them. I did not hear them, and therefore conclude that they must have gotten into the RECORD under the "leave to print additional remarks" which was granted by the House to the member from the second district of Florida. And they were evidently intended for me, for I am the only democratic congressman who occupies a seat in this Hall from the State of Florida. The allegation is a grave and serious one. Wanton and unprovoked it was, and utterly base and absolutely untrue it is.

I am here, sir, as a member of Congress in accordance with the constitution and laws of the State of Florida, and of the United States. My credentials are the sealed certificate of the governor of my State and the wishes of a large majority of the voters of my district expressed at the ballot-box.

Should I admit, for argument, that to be true, which is false, namely, that republican votes in my district "were destroyed by fraud to the extent of 3,000," even then, I would have been legally elected, for in the contest in that district in 1878 my vote exceeded that of ex-Senator Conover, the republican candidate, more than 3,200.

Mr. BISBEE knows that notwithstanding the whole political machinery of the State was in the hands of the republican party in the campaign of 1876, and notwithstanding fraud, intimidation, and tissue ballots, yet I was elected to Congress. He knows that it was publicly predicted by a leading republican in the very convention that nominated my opponent in the contest of 1878 that I would defeat him. He knows, moreover, sir, that the recent census shows that there are nearly sixteen thousand more white people in Florida than there are colored, and that the State is emphatically and without doubt democratic. He knows that as far back as the year 1870 Niblack, a democrat, beat Walls, a republican, for Congress in the State of Florida. Niblack was wickedly and criminally counted out by a republican State canvassing board, but a republican Congress gave to him his seat. And so it was at the same election the democratic candidate for lieutenant-governor was counted out by the same canvassing board, but so justly and clearly was he entitled to the office that the supreme court of the State, composed of a majority of republicans, gave it to him.

It comes with ill grace from Mr. BISBEE to speak of political frauds committed by democrats in Florida. I assert it here as a fact that but for the iniquitous wrong-doings of republicans the State of Florida would have been under the control of democrats long before 1876. The gentleman from the second district is thoroughly acquainted with the means which republicans—Florida republicans—used to thwart the wishes of the people of that State. He well remembers, no doubt, when he was the United States district attorney for the northern district of Florida how even a court of justice was made an engine of persecution, and not only men but feeble women were arrested upon false charges.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I trust the gentleman will not interfere with me.

Mr. CONGER. I wish the gentleman to stop until we get a ruling from the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will stop the gentleman if he is going beyond what the Chair believes to be his right.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Chair to stop the gentleman now, and I was about to assist him in stopping him. I submit the gentleman from Florida is going far beyond what the privilege of this House allows under the title of personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was advised that the gentleman from Florida desired to obtain the floor or intended to claim the floor for the privilege of making a personal explanation, on the ground that there had been inserted in the RECORD a personal assault upon himself which was not uttered in the House, and therefore the Chair recognizes him in consequence of that statement. The Chair thinks that on the statement of facts alleged by the gentleman from Florida, if a personal assault had been made upon him in the manner stated, it is his right to be heard upon the floor in response to any personal assault.

Mr. DAVIDSON. It is but fair and right that I should have that privilege under the circumstances.

Mr. CONGER. I have submitted one point of order on which I would like to have the ruling of the Chair, and I hope the gentleman from Florida will wait the judgment of the House before he attempts to proceed.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I shall submit, sir, of course, to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. The point I make is that in his self-defense, in his personal explanation, he is going outside of it to attack this House, to attack the republican party of this Union, to attack the republicans of Florida, and to attack worse than he was attacked by the gentleman of whom he complains.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Not worse; not worse.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir; in the very last sentence the gentleman uttered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida will confine his reply to matters of a personal character.

Mr. CONGER. I think it is the duty of the Chair whenever a member passes beyond a reasonable personal explanation, without a point of order being raised, to call him to order.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I will proceed, sir.

And he has not forgotten, I am sure——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will enforce the rule. The attention of the Chair was not directed particularly to the language of the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CONGER. If the Chair had heard it he would have stopped him and not left it to me to make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the language the gentleman from Michigan complains of?

Mr. CONGER. I complain of his attack upon the republican party of the United States in this House——

Mr. DAVIDSON. I am not attacking the republican party.

Mr. CONGER. Upon the republican party in this House, in this country, and especially in the State of Florida. I complain of his attack on his fellow-member here, a worse attack than he charges upon him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to run in between the gentlemen and decide which is the worst attack, both being bad. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIDSON. I wish the gentleman from Michigan would hear me through, and he can then see whether I am transgressing the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida will confine himself strictly to what is personal. The Chair will undertake to prevent any transgression of the rules of order.

Mr. DAVIDSON. And I am sure the Chair will not prevent me replying to the attack which has been made upon me.

Mr. HOUK. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOUK. I make the point of order that to attack a member of this House for what he did as a judicial officer or in some other capacity eight or ten years ago does not come within the purview of a personal explanation. It is a violation of the rules and privileges of this House to raise any such personal wrangle under the plea of a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida said there had been inserted in the RECORD an assault upon him not uttered in the House; and the Chair felt it to be his duty to recognize the gentleman that he might have an opportunity to reply. But the gentleman from Florida must confine himself to what is legitimately a personal explanation.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I shall endeavor to do so. I am replying to a charge which was made against me.

And he has not forgotten, I am sure, how a judge of the circuit court of the State was taken I may almost say from the bench, indicted and prosecuted for having pronounced an honest and correct opinion in reference to a political matter, adversely to the interest of the republican party in Florida.

And it has not escaped the recollection of the member from the second district of Florida, I am satisfied, that when he was United States district attorney democratic State senators-elect were arrested by a United States marshal and taken from the capital of the State two hundred miles away to Jacksonville, out of the judicial division in which they resided, just as the Legislature was about to convene, so that a democratic majority in the senate might be destroyed and the republicans be enabled to organize that body.

Mr. HOUK. I think the Chair will see that the gentleman from Florida is not confining himself to the question at issue.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida will confine himself to what is legitimately a personal explanation.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I am endeavoring to do it. My colleague is not complaining, and I think it comes with a bad grace from the gentleman from Tennessee to interfere.

Mr. HOUK. I have not conferred with the gentleman's colleague, but I know what are the rules of the House.

Mr. CALKINS. That the gentleman's colleague is not complaining is not the question. The question is, if the gentleman's explanation goes into that wide range, where will it end?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has more than once stated to the gentleman from Florida that he must confine himself to the personal explanation.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I will do so. But time would fail me to tell of all the infamous wrongs which in days gone by were committed by Florida republicans, and in which my colleague was no doubt a particeps criminis.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must not speak to the injuries perpetrated by Florida republicans, but to the injuries he has himself experienced. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIDSON. Now, sir, as evidence of his bitter, indecent partisanship I beg you and this House to note the fact which appears in his speech that he was not willing to content himself with slandering me, but went from this Hall to the Senate Chamber to misrepresent and traduce a distinguished member of that body. Of the thirty-nine counties in the State of Florida the republicans have majorities in only seven or eight. Is it surprising, then, that a democratic Senator should be elected from that State? And now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I must say that the attack made on me and the democrats of my State by Mr. BISBEE was altogether unwarranted. Why did he make it? It could not have been made for the purpose of aiding Mr. Martin, for the remarks were not relevant or pertinent to his case. Was it made to celebrate his advent into this House, to which he has so recently been admitted by democratic votes? Or was it made with the hope that gentlemen here might be induced to prejudge contested-election cases which may arise in the next House? Whatever his motive was, Mr. Speaker, I have but to say that the unkind, bitter, and malignant spirit evinced by the member from the second district of Florida must have emanated from a heart which is never moved or influenced by the kinder, nobler, and more generous impulses and feelings of our nature.

Mr. BISBEE. I had no notice whatever that my colleague from Florida would rise this morning to make a personal explanation, much less to make a personal attack on me for acts performed, or alleged to have been performed, by myself in the capacity of United States district attorney eight and ten years ago. I did not have the pleasure of listening to his introductory remarks, but I understand the gravamen of them was that something has been inserted in the RECORD——

Mr. DAVIDSON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BISBEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIDSON. The gentleman says he did not hear a part of my remarks. I sent for him to the rooms of the Committee on Elections and knew he was in the House when I rose.

Mr. BISBEE. The gentleman sent for me to the committee-room, as he states, but he did not inform me for what purpose he wished to see me. I supposed it was with reference to a consultation regarding the bill now pending before the House.

I wish to state that I had leave to print that portion of my remarks which were not delivered in the House for the want of time. I disclaim any intention either of violating the rules of this House or of reflecting personally upon the gentleman from Florida. I have not done either. No proper construction of any portion of my remarks will warrant that conclusion. I have stated facts which have occurred; I have stated acts which have been performed, crimes that have been committed upon the purity of the ballot-box by the party and the members of the party to which the gentleman has the honor to belong. I think there is some hope of the gentleman from Florida, and of the members of the party to which he belongs, when I see him showing here some sensitiveness upon that point. "While the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return."

A MEMBER. You live yet.

Mr. BISBEE. At the proper time and in the proper place I shall be ready, as I am ready now if the House desires to listen to the controversy, to defend the republican party and its whole record in the State of Florida.

I did while United States district attorney prosecute to conviction two citizens of the county of Gadsden, where the gentleman resides, one of them an ex-governor of the State, of a conspiracy to prevent republican electors from casting their ballots on election day. That ex-governor was justly convicted, was sentenced, and he served his term in prison and paid the fine. Because weak men signed a petition for his pardon, and because I had pluck enough at that time to prevent his pardon being granted, I have been pursued by the democracy of that State with relentless scorn and contempt. I have so far outlived it.

I will not burden the patience of the House at this time by going into any extended argument to vindicate my administration while I was district attorney in that State. I wish a better state of things existed in Florida now than does exist. I think it is proper in reply to the general remarks of the gentleman from Florida that I should state a fact which shows the condition of the democracy in the county in which the gentleman lives.

A citizen of that county, formerly from Kentucky, a republican, was recently subpœnaed before the United States court to testify in regard to election frauds in the late election. He obeyed that subpœna, and because he obeyed it his house has been visited by armed men, democrats, and his wife and five little children have been threatened that he, the husband and father, would be killed the moment he returned to his home because he obeyed that subpœna. That is the condition of the democratic party in the very county in which the gentleman himself resides.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Let me say to the gentleman that I have never before heard anything of that.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the morning hour of to-day be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the bill (H. R. No. 6969) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, with the Senate amendments thereto, and to recommend that certain amendments be concurred in and certain other amendments be non-concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The report of the committee will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6969) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, together with the Senate amendments thereto, beg leave to report as follows:

Concurrence is recommended in the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, and 6.

Non-concurrence is recommended in amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, and 10.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the amendments in which the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence to be first read.

Mr. ATKINS. I believe I can say to the House that there is virtually an entire concurrence of the Committee on Appropriations in the report just read. If members desire any explanation in regard to the amendments, I can make it. But as the report is virtually concurred in by the whole committee, I suppose such explanation is not necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the vote be first taken on those amendments in which concurrence is recommended; and then on those in which non-concurrence is recommended.

Mr. ATKINS. That will be satisfactory.

The first amendment in which concurrence was recommended was, on page 2, line 18 of the bill, after the words "commission and interest," to insert the words "transportation of funds."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 4, to increase the appropriation for drawing, engraving, and printing charts, &c., from $40,000 to $45,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The last amendment in which the committee recommend concurrence was, on page 10, in line 25, to insert before the words "converting the ships Brooklyn and Lancaster into flagships" the words "repairing and."

The amendment was concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The amendments in which non-concurrence is recommended will now be reported.

The first amendment in which non-concurrence was recommended was, on page 7, line 15, to increase the appropriation for equipment of vessels, &c., from $800,000 to $850,000.

The amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

The next amendment in which non-concurrence was recommended was, in the paragraph making appropriations for contingent expenses of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, to increase the appropriation from $55,000 to $60,000.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The next amendment in which non-concurrence was recommended was, on page 10, line 25, for the Bureau of Construction and Repair, to increase the appropriation from $1,500,000 to $1,600,000.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The next amendment in which the committee recommended non-concurrence was, to strike out in line 11, page 11, in the first paragraph relating to Bureau of Steam Engineering, the word "eight" and insert "nine;" so as to make the appropriation $900,000.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. CONGER. I do not know whether the House desires or not to act on these amendments without knowing what the propositions are. Non-concurrence would seem to be an indication that the House is unwilling to make these amendments; yet I venture to say there are not three men in the House who understand the effect of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] who makes the report stated that the committee were unanimous in their recommendations.

Mr. ATKINS. I have stated two or three times that if the House desired me to make an explanation I would do so. As no such request has been made I did not volunteer any further explanation. As I have already stated, although there were some differences in the committee, we have agreed to the report now made.

Mr. CONGER. Unanimously?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir; unanimously. I hope, however, the gentleman will understand that remark. I stated that there were some differences of opinion as to the ultimate and final determination of these amounts, but the report is a unanimous report. The committee unanimously agreed to these concurrences and non-concurrences.

Mr. CONGER. I do not make any further point.

The next amendment in which the committee recommended non-concurrence was, on page 11, at the end of line 11, to add to the first paragraph relating to Bureau of Steam Engineering the following:

Provided, That $75,000 of this amount shall be immediately available for the purpose of repairing and converting the ships Brooklyn and Lancaster into flag-ships.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The next amendment in which the committee recommended non-concurrence was, to strike out after the word "California," in line 6, page 16, the words "and for two private horses for commanding officer at the same place, seven hundred and fifty;" and insert "five hundred;" so as to make the paragraph read as follows:

For forage for three public horses, one for messenger to commandant and staff, Washington, District of Columbia, and two for general use at marine barracks, Mare Island, California, $500.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The next amendment in which the committee recommended non-concurrence was, to add the following as a new section:

SEC. 2. That sections 1418, 1419, and 1420 of the Revised Statutes, relating to enlistment of minors in the naval service, be, and hereby are, amended by striking out the word "sixteen" and inserting in its stead the word "fourteen."

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the several votes concurring and non-concurring in the amendments respectively; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SEMI-MONTHLY INDEX OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back, without amendment, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 146) to provide for printing and distributing the index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semi-monthly.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the Joint Committee on Printing be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to make the necessary provisions and arrangements for hereafter issuing the index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semi-monthly during the sessions of Congress, beginning with the next ensuing session.

That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to print and distribute the same number of copies of said semi-monthly index as he prints and distributes of the daily issue of the RECORD, and to the same persons and in the same manner.

That the Public Printer shall employ such person to prepare said index as shall be designated by the Joint Committee on Printing, who shall also fix and regulate the compensation to be paid by the Public Printer for the said work and direct the form and manner of its publication: Provided, however, That the compensation allowed for preparing said semi-monthly indexes, including their compilation into a session index, shall not exceed the average total amount now allowed by the Joint Committee on Printing for compiling the session index.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 146) to provide for printing and distributing the index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semi-monthly, report that they believe that the purposes for which the RECORD was designed can only be fulfilled by making its contents available for daily use by the issue of current indexes. They find upon examination that by the adoption of a proper system of indexing semi-monthly indexes can be furnished at the same cost as the present session index. As a most needed reform and improvement can thereby be accomplished without any increase of expenditure, they recommend concurrence in the Senate resolution.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. This resolution so clearly expresses its objects that explanation is scarcely necessary. The RECORD is published daily during the session in order that it may be available in conducting the business of Congress, afford members information necessary for their guidance, and furnish the public with an official statement of the daily proceedings. It is obvious that so far as those purposes are concerned the large amount of money expended in the daily publication of the RECORD is almost absolutely wasted. After Congress has been in session a few weeks the accumulated numbers of the RECORD are nearly valueless, as they present such a bulk of matter, and the task is so hopeless, that no member attempts to use them to learn the condition of any business pending. It is evident that the daily issue of the RECORD can only be made valuable by publishing indexes periodically during the session.

The present session indexes have grown to such enormous proportions that the committee find that by introducing proper system of indexing, semi-monthly and session indexes can be prepared at the same cost as now paid for the session index alone.

Since the first session Forty-third Congress the Joint Committee on Printing have directed the Public Printer to contract for preparing the index and pay for it by the thousand ems. This system has produced bad results. It is obvious that this system simply offers a premium to making as large an index as possible, and that method, system, phraseology of entries, form of arrangement, and everything necessary to be considered to making a good index, would naturally be sacrificed to producing as many thousand ems of printed matter as possible. This is the key to all the defects of the index of the RECORD that are now so generally complained of.

To illustrate this point: RECORD of first session Forty-third Congress contained 5,954 pages, and the index was contained in 366 pages. RECORD of last session (second session Forty-sixth Congress) contained 4,976 pages, and the index amounted to 1,083 pages.

There has been no change in the form or system of the index during this time to account for or justify this increase in size, but simply an increased experience and ingenuity in making the entries as prolix as possible.

The committee propose to change this system and either pay according to the number of pages of the RECORD, or to fix a definite price which the Public Printer shall be allowed to pay, not exceeding the present total.

The resolution provides that the Public Printer shall not allow greater compensation than is now allowed, and the committee are assured that under a proper system of indexing this compensation will be ample.

In regard to the printing it is evident from what we have stated that at least six hundred superfluous pages have been added to the index of a single Congress, which have not only made the indexes superlatively bad, but also entailed a very serious waste of money. From one of the reports of the Public Printer (Senate Miscellaneous Document 23, third session Forty-fifth Congress, page 17) we learn that the cost of printing and publishing 7,279 pages of the RECORD was as follows: Composing-room, $60,787.32; press-room, $53,924.18; folding-room, $15,057.93; stereotype-room, $2,969.24; bindery, $25,278.33; miscellaneous items, $3,351.13. Omitting the cost of binding and miscellaneous items as expenses that would not be materially affected by the number of pages, we find that the direct cost of the superfluous pages has been $18.23 a page. Making a full allowance for expenses that would not be reduced by reducing the number of pages, it would appear to be a moderate estimate to say that the cost of printing and publishing the superfluous pages of the index is not less than $5,000 a year. In other words, the amount of money saved in printing the session index will pay for printing the semi-monthly indexes.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DELAY IN PRINTING PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Public Printer inform this House of the cause of delay in printing certain reports necessary for the information of Congress; and why the same were not printed and furnished at the commencement of the present session of Congress, namely, report on foreign relations, of Chief Signal Officer, Navy and Interior Departments, Chief of Ordnance, and report on finances.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is accompanied by a report from the committee, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution of inquiry in regard to the delay in publication of certain reports therein set forth, respectfully report the same back to the House with the accompanying letter from the Public Printer in relation to the subject, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration thereof:

OFFICE OF PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, January 26, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor of acknowledging the receipt of your letter inclosing a copy of the following resolution, referred by the House on the 24th instant to the Committee on Printing:

"Resolved, That the Public Printer inform this House of the cause of delay in printing certain reports necessary for the information of Congress; and why the same were not printed and furnished at the commencement of the present session of Congress, namely, report on foreign relations, of Chief Signal Officer, Navy and Interior Departments, Chief of Ordnance, and report on finances."

The following are the reasons why the reports named in the resolution "were not printed and furnished at the commencement of the present session of Congress:"

First. All of the copy for the report on foreign relations has not been received at this office.

Second. No portion of the copy for the report of the Chief Signal Officer has been received at this office.

Third. All of the copy of the report of the Secretary of the Navy was not furnished until the 10th of last month. It will contain a greater number of pages than any report heretofore printed. It is nearly all in type, and will be printed as speedily as possible.

Fourth. The letter-press of the report of the Chief of Ordnance was completed on the 10th of last month. It will contain many lithographic and other illustrations, (executed by contractors,) which were not delivered until the 16th instant. It will be completed within a few days.

Fifth. The usual number of the report on finances was delivered to the document-room on the 25th instant.

Sixth. The report of the Secretary of the Interior will make three large volumes. The first volume contains the reports of the Land and Indian Bureaus. The report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office will contain an unusual number of pages. It will be finished in about two weeks.

Volume second, being miscellaneous reports, has been printed, but the copy for the index has not been furnished.

The third volume is on education, but no portion of the copy has been furnished this office.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.,

JNO. D. DEFREES,
Public Printer.

Hon. O. R. SINGLETON,
Chairman of the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Printing ask to be discharged from the further consideration of this resolution and that it be laid on the table. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

HAYDEN'S ATLAS OF COLORADO.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred with Senate amendments a resolution of the House directing the Public Printer to furnish 3,000 copies of the Atlas of Colorado, by F. V. Hayden, have directed me to report back as a substitute for that resolution a joint resolution.

The joint resolution reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 388) to print 3,000 copies of the Atlas of Colorado, by F. V. Hayden.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish 3,000 copies of the Atlas of Colorado, by F. V. Hayden, provided the same can be supplied in sheets in every way equal in style and quality to the edition published by order of the Department of the Interior, for a sum not exceeding $3.50 per copy; and provided also, that the necessary corrections be made in the same up to date; 800 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,515 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 685 for the use of the Department of the Interior; and the sum of $10,500 is hereby appropriated for the purposes of this resolution.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISCIPLINE AND INSTRUCTION AT WEST POINT ACADEMY.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The Committee on Printing has also directed me to report back, with a recommendation that it be concurred in, a resolution of the Senate to print the report of the joint commission appointed under the act of June 21, 1860, to examine into the organization, discipline, and instruction at the West Point Academy.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed 1,000 copies of the report of the joint commission appointed under the eighth section of the act of Congress of June 21, 1860, to examine into the organization, system of discipline, and course of instruction of the United States Military Academy at West Point, submitted December 13, 1860.

The SPEAKER. The report of the Committee on Printing accompanying this resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing having considered the accompanying resolution, respectfully report the same back without amendment, and recommend that the same do pass. The cost will be about $890.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WELLS. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6730) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; and I ask the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6730) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

They recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 28, 29, and 32.

They recommend non-concurrence in the amendments numbered 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 30, and 31.

The SPEAKER. The question will be taken first upon the amendments of the Senate in which concurrence is recommended.

First amendment:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "sixty-seven" and insert "sixty-six;" so it will read:

"For pay of sixty-six agents of Indian affairs at the following-named agencies, at the rates respectively indicated, namely."

Mr. CONGER. What agency is left out?

Mr. WELLS. Malheur agency. We have consolidated some of the agencies. The committee recommend concurrence in that amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

Strike out the following:

"At the Malheur agency, at $1,000."

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

Strike out "ninety-seven" and insert "ninety-six;" so it will read:

"At the Moquis Pueblo agency, at $1,300; in all, $96,800."

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh amendments:

Strike out "seven" and insert "six;" after "Umatilla" insert "and;" strike out "and Malheur," and strike out "two thousand one" and insert "one thousand eight;" so it will read:

"Six for the tribes in Oregon, namely, two for the Klamath, and one each for Grand Ronde, Siletz, Umatilla, and Warm Springs agencies, at $300 per annum each, $1,800."

The amendments were concurred in.

Eighth and ninth amendments:

Strike out "six" and insert "seven," and strike out "one thousand eight" and insert "two thousand one;" so it will read:

"Seven for the tribes in Washington Territory, to be assigned to such agencies as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, at $300 per annum each, $2,100."

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, is it necessary to read all of these amendments?

The SPEAKER. These are amendments of the Senate, which have to be acted upon in the House. The committee recommend concurrence in these two amendments.

The amendments were concurred in.

Tenth amendment:

After the word "Interior" insert "and for special interpreters, when necessary;" so it will read:

"For additional payment of the said interpreters, to be distributed in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, and for special interpreters, when necessary, $4,000; in all, $26,500."

The amendment was concurred in.

Eleventh amendment:

Strike out "fifteen" and insert "fifty;" so it will read:

"For subsistence and civilization of the Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Apaches, Kiowas, Comanches, and Wichitas who have been collected upon the reservations set apart for their use and occupation, $350,000."

The SPEAKER. The committee recommend concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. WELLS. This is an increase of $35,000 over the appropriation as recommended by the House. The Committee on Appropriations recommended $315,000, and so the bill went to the Senate, but the Senate have increased the appropriation to $350,000. I will state to the House that we have assurances from the Indian Department it will be necessary to have this increased appropriation. Last year we appropriated $305,000, and the Department has asked for a deficiency of $5,000. We are informed that upward of ten thousand Indians are upon these reservations, and are short of rations. They are warlike tribes, and we must feed them, or they will go upon the war-path, and then we shall have to fight them. This increased appropriation is necessary, and is recommended by the Department. The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in this appropriation.

The amendment was concurred in.

Twelfth amendment:

Strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty;" so it will read:

"For support and civilization of Joseph's band of Nez Percés Indians in the Indian Territory, $20,000."

The amendment was concurred in.

Thirteenth amendment:

Strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty;" so it will read:

"For support and civilization of Shoshone Indians in Wyoming, $20,000."

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourteenth and fifteenth amendments:

After "Yakamas" insert "and all Indians removed from Malheur reservation," and strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty-two;" so it will read:

"For subsistence and civilization of the Yakamas and of Indians removed from Malheur reservation, including pay of employés, $32,000."

The amendments were concurred in.

Twenty-eighth amendment:

Insert the following:

"And out of this sum the Secretary of the Interior may make and pay such allowance, not exceeding the rate of $1,000 a year, as he shall think just, to Captain R. H. Pratt, in charge of the school at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was concurred in.

Twenty-ninth amendment:

Insert the following:

"For this amount, to assist the Creek Nation of Indians in rebuilding the 'Tallahassee mission school building,' destroyed by fire December 19, 1880, $5,000."

The amendment was concurred in.

Thirty-second amendment:

Strike out the following:

"SEC. 6. All advertisements for contracts involving the expenditure of money herein appropriated shall be made at least sixty days before any such contract shall be awarded."

The amendment was concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the amendments in which non-concurrence is recommended.

The Clerk read the amendments.

Sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, twenty-second, twenty-third, twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh amendments:

Strike out in each of the following paragraphs, after the words "Indian service," the words "including traveling expenses of agents and transportation of supplies;" so the paragraphs will then read as follows:

"GENERAL INCIDENTAL EXPENSES OF THE INDIAN SERVICE.

"Incidental expenses of Indian service in Arizona: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service, support and civilization of Indians at the Colorado River, Pima and Maricopa, and Moquis Pueblo agencies, $20,000, and pay of employés at same agencies, $16,000; in all, $36,000.

"Incidental expenses of Indian service in California: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service, support and civilization of Indians at the Round Valley, Hoopa Valley, Tule River, and Mission agencies, $23,000, and pay of employés at same agencies, $9,000; in all, $32,000.

"Incidental expenses of Indian service in Colorado: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service and pay of employés, $4,000.

"Incidental expenses of Indian service in Dakota: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service and pay of employés at eight agencies for the Sioux, $10,000.

"Incidental expenses of Indian service in Idaho: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service, $1,000, and pay of employés at Lemhi agency and additional employés at Fort Hall, Idaho, $3,000; in all, $4,000.

"Incidental expenses of Indian service in Montana: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service and pay and expenses of detectives, $5,000.

"Incidental expenses of Indian service in Nevada: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service, support and civilization of Indians located on the Pi-Ute, Walker River, Western Shoshone, and Pyramid Lake reservations, $7,000, and pay of employés, same agencies, $6,000; in all, $13,000.

"Incidental expenses of Indian service in New Mexico: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service, support and civilization of Indians at Abiquiu, Pueblo, and Mescalero agencies, $10,000, and pay of employés at same agencies, $8,000; in all, $18,000.

"Incidental expenses of Indian service in Oregon: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service, support and civilization of Indians, at Grand Ronde and Siletz agencies, $16,000, and pay of employés at the same agencies, $8,000; in all, $24,000.

"Incidental expenses of Indian service in Utah: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service, support and civilization of Indians, at Uintah Valley agency, $8,000, and pay of employés at said agency, $3,000; in all, $11,000.

"Incidental expenses of Indian service in Washington: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service at seven agencies, and pay of employés, and the support and civilization of Indians at Colville and Nisqually agencies, $20,000.

"Incidental expenses of Indian service in Wyoming: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service and pay of employés, $2,000."

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence in all of these amendments.

The amendments were non-concurred in.

Thirtieth amendment:

Strike out the following:

"That all laws and parts of laws creating or authorizing the commission of ten citizens provided for in the act of April 10, 1869, be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Mr. WELLS. The committee recommend non-concurrence in that amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Is that subject to the point of order?

Mr. WELLS. The gentleman cannot raise the point of order upon this amendment, as it is an amendment which comes from the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. Is it a Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the Senate is to strike out the words which have been read, which are a part of the text of the bill.

Mr. WELLS. The House adopted this portion of the bill and sent it to the Senate, and the bill now has been returned from the Senate with an amendment to strike out the words which have just been read by the Clerk. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence in that amendment of the Senate to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to have a vote on concurrence in that amendment of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. It is competent for the gentleman to make such a motion.

Mr. CONGER. I withhold the point of order at this time, Mr. Speaker, and will raise it if necessary when the matter comes before the House again on the conference report.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Thirty-first amendment:

Insert the following:

"Expenses of Indian commissioners: For the expenses of the commission of citizens, serving without compensation, appointed by the President under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of April 10, 1869, $10,000."

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. WELLS moved to reconsider the votes just taken, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up at this time the privileged report made by the Committee on Rules, and ask the Clerk now to read it for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the expiration of the morning hour on Monday, the 14th of February, the Committee for the District of Columbia shall be entitled to the floor for the consideration during the remainder of that day of business for the District as may be called up by said committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the work upon the hands of the House now, I trust that this will lead to no extended debate. This is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules, adopted in view of the fact that under the Calendar system, adopted by the present Congress in its new rules, which cut off the District day, the consideration of legislation for the District of Columbia has not had perhaps a fair chance.

Mr. CALKINS. Is it contemplated that that resolution shall apply only to the remainder of this Congress?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It applies to only one day, Monday the 14th instant.

Mr. HAYES. Would it interfere with the consideration of appropriation bills?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it would interfere, but that the question of consideration might be raised if desired at that time. This is the opinion of the Chair after a casual reflection, without, however, going into the merits of the question.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTINGENT FUND, NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a statement of the expenditures of the contingent fund of the said Department; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, and ordered to be printed.

NEW ROCHELLE HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of the survey of New Rochelle Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SAN JOAQUIN RIVER.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the survey of the San Joaquin River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INVALIDATED LAND-PATENTS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting papers relating to land-patents set aside by the courts, with the draught of the bill for the relief of patentees; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. COX. I now ask, Mr. Speaker, to present an amendment to the original bill in reference to apportionment, which I ask to have printed. I offer it as a pending amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That after the 3d of March, 1883, the House of Representatives shall be composed of three hundred and seven members, to be apportioned among the several States as follows: Alabama, eight; Arkansas, five; California, five; Colorado, one; Connecticut, four; Delaware, one; Florida, two; Georgia, nine; Illinois, nineteen; Indiana, twelve; Iowa, ten; Kansas, six; Kentucky, ten; Louisiana, six; Maine, four; Maryland, six; Massachusetts, eleven; Michigan, ten; Minnesota, five; Mississippi, seven; Missouri, thirteen; Nebraska, three; Nevada, one; New Hampshire, two; New Jersey, seven; New York, thirty-two; North Carolina, nine; Ohio, twenty; Oregon, one; Pennsylvania, twenty-seven; Rhode Island, two; South Carolina, six; Tennessee, ten; Texas, ten; Vermont, two; Virginia, nine; West Virginia, four; Wisconsin, eight.

Mr. SHERWIN. Mr. Speaker, it is needless for me to state the importance of the bill now before us. Whenever apportionment bills have been before Congress in past years for discussion they have always afforded a theme for warm and animated debate. They have often partaken of a partisan nature. They have been governed largely in their consideration by the interests of the constituency of members of the different States and of the different sections of the country.

For that reason it has been a difficult question, and the result of it has been that, with one exception, the apportionment has not been made until the second year after the census has been taken.

I cannot see, sir, any reason why this apportionment shall not be made at this session of Congress. The data upon which it is to be made are all in our possession. The calculations on which the basis of apportionment shall rest have all been made and are before us. They are clear, and every gentleman, by the expenditure of a few hours' time, can ascertain what ratio will be most just to the different States and sections of the country, and which should therefore be adopted by us in this bill.

I was pleased to listen in the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to his eulogium upon our representative system; to the fact that it is a crowning glory of our Government and that it is only exhibited in its perfection in this country. My pleasure in listening to him was equaled by the fact of the unanimity with which his sentiments were applauded by the members upon this floor and the general praise his eloquence received from all sides.

But there is another question, Mr. Speaker, connected with this important matter of representative government which I should have been glad if the gentleman had referred to, and I should have been pleased if he had brought the force of his generalization and the gifts of his eloquence and pictured it before this House. That is that not only is it made the duty of Congress to adopt a representative system adequate to the needs of the country and distributed properly among the people of the country, but that they shall also see that every man who by law has a right to vote for the members so provided for shall be free to vote and exercise all the privileges which the law gives him without restraint or molestation; otherwise, our enactmments here are futile and our laws are vain. We should not be content, Mr. Speaker, until every man, be he rich or poor, white or black, whether he lives among the bayous of the Yazoo or the pine groves of North Carolina; whether he lives upon the prairies of Illinois or the hills of New England, shall be free to cast his ballot unawed and unalarmed by fear of personal injury or social ostracism, and that the officer who receives his ballot on the day of election shall be fearless to honestly receive and honestly count it and make an honest return. When that shall obtain there will be a grander theme for eloquence than the gentleman has yet touched upon, for we will have attained to the summit of the representative system, and when shall be added to that the purity and intelligence of the individual voter, it would seem that we had reached the perfection of good government under the representative system.

Some gentlemen have said that this apportionment is easy to be made because it is a mere question of arithmetic. Now, it is more than a question of arithmetic. It is a redistribution of political power. To be sure, this distribution is made upon arithmetical principles. But it is not a question of arithmetic only; if it were we could bring in our boys who have ciphered as far as long division and let them make the figures. We could give them a number to be divided. We could give the dividend and they could draw curved lines to the right and the left of it; but the important question would be what shall be the divisor. To determine what that divisor shall be is a political act. That is a political question. But having given the divisor, then the processes of arithmetic proceed. The boy can find the quotient; but that quotient when it is found represents the potent integers of political power.

Now, then, the change of a divisor from three hundred and one to three hundred and eleven or three hundred and nineteen may change the political status of this House. It may change the political organization of the electoral college, and therefore it does assume a political aspect. I can say, with the gentleman from New York, that I could wish as he wishes, that there could be no partisan feeling in this matter; that we could get rid of this ogre of partisanship. But looking at the facts as they exist to-day, as sensible men, we know we cannot get rid of it, because it is a political question, a redistribution of power that will not affect this Congress, but that will affect five Congresses hereafter to be elected, that will extend for five Congresses to come, and that shall not only affect them but shall affect the next two presidential elections. Not only that, but it will affect the legislation in those next five Congresses. It will affect your tariff laws or legislation. It will affect your legislation on the monetary matters of this country. It will affect your legislation upon education. It will affect your legislation upon all great questions that divide the parties of this country. These questions are only reached through parties; and as they are reached through parties this apportionment is of necessity a party question and assumes a political aspect from its very nature and object.

Now, this is the way that I look at this matter, and I shall discuss it from that stand-point; not referring to parties in any invidious sense; not referring to sections or States in any odious sense; but as a matter to be got at practically, I shall accept the existing situation, and discuss the question from that point of view.

There have been three bills introduced before this House: the bill of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] providing for three hundred and one members; the bill of the majority of the committee providing for three hundred and eleven members; the bill that was presented by myself, and is sustained by the minority with but one exception, providing for three hundred and nineteen members. Now in discussing these ratios, all the principles involved in this subject can be seen and understood. The same method of arriving at the conclusions can be applied to any one of the numbers that is applied to these.

Having the views on the subject which I have expressed, I propose briefly to examine the two bills before this House, and the one of the gentleman of New York, [Mr. COX,] which he proposes to offer as an amendment. These bills propose a House of three hundred and one members upon a ratio of 1 : 164,018, a House of three hundred and eleven members upon a ratio of 1 : 158,745, and a House of three hundred and nineteen members upon a ratio of 1 : 154,764, respectively.

I will first examine the effect of the different ratios upon the representation of the States as compared with their present representation.

Upon the basis of three hundred and one representatives each of the following-named States gain one member: Arkansas, South Carolina, Mississippi, West Virginia, California, Iowa, and Michigan; Nebraska and Minnesota each gain two, Kansas three, and Texas four—a gain of eighteen in all, of which the democratic States have eight and the republican States ten.

The losses upon a basis of three hundred and one are one each for the States of Florida, Indiana, Maine, New Hampshire, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and Vermont, and two in New York, of which losses the certainly democratic States sustain two and the republican States eight, making a net gain to the certainly democratic States of six and to the republican States which are sometimes democratic of two. The eighteen States not named neither gain nor lose.

Upon a basis of three hundred and eleven members fifteen States gain altogether twenty-two members, namely: Arkansas, California, Georgia, Iowa, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, and West Virginia gain one each; Minnesota and Nebraska two each; Kansas three, and Texas four; of which gain the certainly democratic States have twelve and the other States ten.

Four States, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York, each lose one, leaving the net gain to the certainly democratic States twelve and to the republican States six. The other nineteen States neither gain nor lose.

Upon a basis of three hundred and nineteen, the bill of the minority, twenty-one States gain twenty-nine members, namely, Arkansas, California, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Ohio, Kentucky, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and West Virginia each one; Nebraska, Minnesota, and Michigan each two; Kansas three, and Texas four; of which number the certainly democratic States gain thirteen and the other States sixteen.

Upon the basis of three hundred and nineteen, three States, Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont each lose one, making the net gain to the certainly democratic States thirteen, and to the other States thirteen, and producing an equality of gains between the States certainly democratic and the other States.

To recapitulate: Upon a basis of three hundred and one, the certainly democratic States have a net gain of 6; the other States have a net gain of 2. Upon a basis of three hundred and eleven, the certainly democratic States have a net gain of 12; the other States have a net gain of 6. Upon a basis of three hundred and nineteen, the certainly democratic States have a net gain of 13; the other States have a net gain of 13.

Fewer States (only three) lose upon the last basis than upon either of the others.

Fewer States (fourteen) stand still without gain or loss than upon the other rates. And four of these fourteen States, namely, Oregon, Nevada, Colorado, and Delaware could not gain upon any practicable ratio, thus leaving only ten States stationary.

The gains and losses under the different ratios are owing to the change of divisor and consequent change of fractions. Upon the basis of three hundred and one, the number of Representatives upon an even division would be but two hundred and eighty-two, and the twenty highest fractions are therefore each given a Representative to make the number three hundred and one.

Upon a basis of three hundred and eleven, and also three hundred and nineteen, members are given to eighteen fractions. The States which gain a member upon a fraction at three hundred and nineteen which do not have them at three hundred and eleven are Illinois, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Michigan, New York, Ohio, and California.

The basis of three hundred and twenty-two would give a net gain of thirteen to the States certainly democratic and sixteen to the other States. But in the interest of fairness the minority chose three hundred and nineteen instead of three hundred and twenty-two.

I do not contend that the different sections of the country should necessarily gain equally in their representation. Of course that must depend upon the population of the States and sections. But as will be seen by the examples I have given, there is quite a latitude within which changes may be made, and within those limits is the field of dispute, over which is waged the war of debate, upon which also are sought to be gained advantages which could not be secured upon a division based upon whole numbers only and not partly upon fractions. This being so, we must recognize the fact and select that number for a ratio which will be most fair and equitable in its operation.

In my opinion that number is the one that gives us three hundred and nineteen members. It is in accordance with the mathematical principles used in making apportionments. It leaves fewer States with their representation decreased. More States gain in that number than either of the others. Fewer States are stationary. It distributes the gains more generally over the country than the other numbers. And happily it gives no advantage to one section or party over any other section or party. The other numbers fail in all these particulars, and therefore should not be adopted. A great injustice will be done if either of them shall be selected.

The number three hundred and nineteen approaches nearest mathematically to an accurate apportionment as between the groups of States under discussion. The population of the Southern States is .3748 per cent. of the whole representative population of the United States. At three hundred and one those States have .3722 per cent. of the representation; at three hundred and eleven they have .3794 per cent. of the representation; at three hundred and nineteen they have .3730 per cent. of the representation, the latter number being the nearest of any of the ratios in question.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and others have asserted that dividing the country into three sections, namely, the Northeast, comprising the New England States, with New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania; the South, comprising the sixteen old slave States; and the West, embracing all the other States, the number three hundred and one would be most nearly accurate of any of the other numbers. He is mistaken in this as, at the risk of being prolix, I will show by the following statement: The Northeastern States mentioned contain .2938 per cent. of the representative population. At three hundred and one they would have .2956 per cent. of the representation; at three hundred and eleven they would have .2926 per cent. of the representation; at three hundred and nineteen they would have .2946 per cent. of the representation, showing again that three hundred and nineteen is the nearest to accuracy.

The Western States mentioned have .3313 per cent. of the representative population. At three hundred and one these States have .3322 per cent. of the representation; at three hundred and eleven these States have .3279 per cent. of the representation; at three hundred and nineteen these States have .3322 per cent. of the representation, showing once more that no number is more nearly accurate.

In the Southern States it is shown, according to the table given above, that three hundred and nineteen is the nearest.

My excuse for entering into what might seem an over refinement of figures is to demonstrate that that number, three hundred and nineteen, which upon its face is most just as between the Southern and the Northern States is also the most accurate. And further, that by grouping the States into three sections, Northeast, West, and South, that accuracy is still upon the side of three hundred and nineteen.

Another point worth observing is that all the gains on present representation between the numbers three hundred and one and three hundred and eleven fall to the Southern States, the South, as I have before pointed out, at the latter number having a net gain of six; while between the numbers three hundred and eleven and three hundred and nineteen all the gains but one are in the Northern States, and having arrived at three hundred and nineteen the gains between North and South are equal. Another thing to be observed is that the greatest loss which the New England and Central States sustain actually and relatively is at three hundred and one. The Central States do not hold their own until they pass three hundred and eleven.

Can any member in this House, in the face of these figures, vote for either of the numbers three hundred and one or three hundred and eleven? The only reasonable excuse for so doing is that three hundred and nineteen makes the House too large. It is but eight larger than three hundred and eleven. Who can say an addition of eight or eighteen would be at all perceptible in this House?

Besides, I do not think that three hundred and nineteen is too large a House or too great an increase. At the last apportionment the House was increased by the addition of fifty members, while the representative population had increased but 6,936,484. This amendment proposes an increase of but twenty-six, while the representative population has increased 11,214,090. The question of the size of the House has been much discussed at each apportionment. Many of the wisest statesmen of our country have favored a larger House than this amendment proposes. Such statesmen as Edward Everett, John Quincy Adams, and Thomas H. Benton have contended for a high number. I will not enter into any argument upon that point, as it is after all largely a matter of opinion. But we know that the lower house of the Massachusetts Legislature formerly contained six hundred and forty members, and experience showed that its legislation at that time was conducted carefully and well. The fault of whatever confusion there may be in this House may be more in our rules and in ourselves than in the size of the body. The minority has incorporated in its amendment a provision that the Representatives apportioned to the different States shall be elected by districts, and that those districts shall be composed of contiguous territory. This was a part of the law of 1872 and of 1842, and should be retained in this and in all future apportionment laws.

It is claimed by some gentlemen upon this floor that it is a needless and unconstitutional interference with State rights. It is said that the States are free under the Constitution to choose the method by which their Representatives in Congress shall be elected; that they are free to construct districts as to them shall seem best, whether of contiguous territory or otherwise, or to abandon the district system and elect their Representatives upon one general ticket. This claim is not new. It has been asserted here before. So long ago as in 1823 a select committee was appointed in the House of Representatives for the purpose of "inquiring into the expediency of recommending to the several States the propriety of amending the Constitution of the United States in such manner that the mode of electing the members of the House of Representatives in Congress may be uniform throughout the United States," and for other purposes; and that committee, of which Mr. McDuffie, of South Carolina, was chairman, made a very able report upon the subject. Many States at that time elected their Representatives upon a general State ticket. It was seen that by that system the voice of a minority could be suppressed. That New York, for instance, could send a delegation to Congress which would be solidly democratic or solidly republican, and that too by a small majority of the popular vote, instead of one which should represent various interests and constituencies as now under the district system. It was also seen that a State might be gerrymandered in the interest of the party in power, by making one district of contiguous territory and another separated into parts; by constituting one district so that it should elect two or more members and another one member; that one district should have too great a population and another too small.

That committee in its report submitted a plan which proposed "that each State shall be divided into as many districts as will equal the number of Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress, and that each of the said districts shall elect one Representative." The committee further say:

> It is susceptible of demonstration that the elections might be so arranged by a party in power that a small minority of the people would elect a majority of the national Representatives. The mode of operation would be various according to varying circumstances. Sometimes the object would be accomplished by changing the district into the general ticket system, sometimes by an artificial arrangement of districts, and sometimes by a skillful combination of both.
> With a view to give strength and durability to the essential bonds of union, it is of the utmost consequence that the local minorities in the several States and various geographical divisions of our extensive country should have a fair and full representation in Congress. In periods of deep political excitement nothing is better calculated to allay sectional animosities and subdue the angry spirit of faction than the mediatorial influence of such Representatives.

The committee proposed an amendment to the Constitution which should make it imperative upon the States, without any legislation by Congress, to divide their State into districts, each of which should elect one Representative.

Again, in 1842, the question was before Congress and gave rise to a long and able debate. It arose upon an amendment to the bill for apportionment then pending in the House, and was offered by Mr. Halstead, of New Jersey, by direction of the Committee on Elections. The amendment was in these words:

> And be it further enacted, That each State shall be divided by the Legislature thereof into as many districts composed of contiguous territory as shall be equal to the number of Representatives to which said State may be entitled in the House of Representatives of the United States, and that each of said districts shall elect one Representative.

At that time there were seven of the twenty-six States which elected their Representatives upon a general ticket. The point was raised by Mr. Atherton, of New Hampshire, as to whether the amendment was germane to the bill or not. The chairman decided that it was, and overruled the point of order. After several days' discussion the amendment was adopted in the House, and it was afterward adopted in the Senate and became a part of the apportionment law of 1842. The point most fully discussed was as to the power of Congress to direct that the States should elect by districts under that clause of section 4 of the Constitution which declares that Congress may at any time make or alter regulations as to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives.

It was in 1842 also, that the representation of minorities greater than a moiety was first provided for. In the year 1832 Daniel Webster had attempted to provide for the representation of moieties, and made a report upon that subject distinguished for the strength and clearness which always characterized his efforts. He was defeated at that time, but his principles were adopted in 1842 and have continued in operation ever since.

Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, in discussing this district system, said that—

> It seemed evident to him Congress had the power, under this clause of the Constitution, to make regulations respecting the elections, totally and wholly, as, to alter the State regulations * * * he was astonished that any man who claimed to be a State-rights man should come forward and advocate the general-ticket system.

Mr. Arnold, of Tennessee, said:

> They had a right to interfere in this, and it was their duty to do it now.

Again he said:

> It was a question of expediency entirely. It involved no constitutional question.

Mr. Barnard, of New York, said:

> In his opinion the time had come when in consequence of the manner in which some of the States of the Union had performed this duty, it was the duty of Congress to interfere in this matter.

Mr. William Cost Johnson, of Maryland, said:

> He believed Congress had full and ample power to pass such a law.

Mr. PENDLETON, of Ohio, said:

> He was amazed that there should be any difference of opinion as to the power of Congress to adopt the amendment.

Mr. Butler, of South Carolina, said:

> He had always considered that if there was any question settled by the express terms of the Constitution, it was the power of Congress over this whole subject.

In the Senate Mr. Rives, of Virginia, conceded that Congress had the power, but he opposed its exercise on grounds of expediency.

Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, also asserted the power of Congress and advocated its expediency and necessity.

I do not understand the opposition to this section of the amendment. Are we still within the shadow of the extra session? Do we still breathe its atmosphere? Must the National Government again be warned from trespassing upon the sacred precincts of a State, and forbidden to suggest even that the States shall elect members of Congress by districts and that those districts shall be contiguous? I cannot explain this opposition upon any hypothesis, except an unwillingness to concede any right or power in Congress to legislate upon the subject of the election of members of Congress.

I commend gentlemen to the words I have read of the State-rights statesmen of the country upon this subject. If we have the right, as those statesmen concede we have, to legislate upon the subject, why not accept this amendment? Can it be that there are any States which desire the opportunity to return to the general-ticket system, to crush out some troublesome minority? Is it because of a desire to make districts of territory not contiguous? It seems to me to be the duty of Congress to retain control of this matter in the interests of fair elections. I am not ready to wipe out this faint vestige of national control over them.

I think the bill of the minority should commend itself to every gentleman in this House who desires a true, just, and equitable apportionment.

Mr. NEW. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Is it not true that the number 319 will leave a larger unrepresented population than the number 301, or 307, or 311?

Mr. SHERWIN. It leaves a slightly larger aggregate of fraction throughout the whole country unrepresented than 301 or 311. I am not informed as to 307.

Mr. NEW. I have made some calculations with care, and according to the results of my figuring, 319 would leave a larger number of people unrepresented than either of the other numbers.

Mr. SHERWIN. It does so apparently, as compared with two of the numbers. But the gentleman ought also to understand that, comparing the numbers of fractions unrepresented between the two sections of the country, in one section we have sixteen States and in the other we have twenty-two States; so that, in reality, as applied to the population of the country, this number is nearer the true mathematical representation than any other we can get. Also it gives us a greater representation for all of the States which gain at all, and fewer States lose at that number than at any other; so I cannot see how the fractions are unrepresented.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER.) To whom does the gentleman from Illinois yield the balance of his time?

Mr. SHERWIN. I yield it to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CROWLEY,] or as much of it as he desires.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. REAGAN, from the Commitee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriation for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution relative to the counting of electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. No. 2054) to remove the political disabilities of Richard Fatherly, of Little Rock, Arkansas, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. CROWLEY. Mr. Speaker, no measure coming before Congress can be more important than the one under discussion. It is to determine for ten years to come the representation of each State in this House.

The first question which meets us at the threshold of this debate is as to the wisdom and policy of increasing the numbers of Representatives. From sixty-five members fixed by the Constitution in 1789, we have grown to two hundred and ninety-three members in eighty years; and it is now proposed by every measure before this House to still further increase its membership. We stand to-day, not including New Hampshire, the eighth largest legislative body in the world. Hungary, but a portion of the Austrian Empire, has a chamber of magnates of 731, and a house of representatives of 444; and yet no one will claim that there is greater wisdom and deliberation in the Parliament of Hungary because of this large representation. England, which legislates for nearly three hundred millions of human beings, has a House of Lords of 497, and a House of Commons of 652, and yet I am informed that the daily average attendance upon the House of Commons is less than the daily average attendance upon this House of Representatives.

France, in her Corps Legislatif, has a Senate of 300 members and a Chamber of Deputies of 532; and yet so noisy is that Chamber of Deputies that it cannot claim to be a deliberative body.

Italy has a Senate of 220 members and a Chamber of Deputies of 508; Prussia has an upper house of 302 members and a lower house of 434; Austria has an upper house of 191 members and a lower house of 383. And the German Empire, where are gathered all the German States, has in its upper branch only 59 members and in its lower 397.

Next comes the American Congress. And let me say that from the numbers of this House it is noisy and confusing and unwieldy also. It is disorderly and at times turbulent. This calendar which I hold in my hand, containing over twelve hundred bills, shows that it cannot act with dispatch upon all the measures coming before it. The roll-call of the members of this House upon the average now takes upward of one-half hour. We have adopted a system of rules, complex, arbitrary, and apparently tyrannical, for the purpose of enabling us to dispatch business and to aid in the deliberations of this body.

Sitting or standing in this outer circle where many of us are located, it is now impossible, from the size of this Chamber, for us to know what is being daily transacted here. We are compelled to look into the RECORD of the next morning for the purpose of accurately learning what is daily transpiring in our very presence. My observation is that a strong voice, an interesting subject, long experience, or great reputation only can arrest, command, and hold the attention of this House constituted as it is.

Let me say, in speaking of the size of a legislative body, it is interesting to turn back for a short time to the century's experience of the workings of this House of Representatives, to hear what was said by the founders of the Government concerning it when they framed it, and what has been said by the great commentators who have spoken concerning its organization and workings since that time. It was feared by many of the fathers of the Constitution that a small legislative body would not possess a proper knowledge of the local circumstances of their constituents; that a small number would be an unsafe depository of power and would be taken from those who would not sympathize with the feelings of the people. Story, in his Commentary on the Constitution, written forty years after its adoption, speaking of the objections urged against a small legislative body, says:

Time and experience have demonstrated the fallacy of some, and greatly impaired, if they have not utterly destroyed, the force of all of these objections. The fears, which were at that period so studiously cherished; the alarms, which were so forcibly spread; the dangers to liberty, which were so strangely exaggerated; and the predominance of aristocratical and exclusive power, which was so confidently predicted, have all vanished into air, into thin air. Truth has silently dissolved the phantoms raised by imaginations heated by prejudice or controversy; and at the distance of forty years we look back with astonishment at the laborious reasoning which was employed to tranquilize the doubts and assuage the jealousies of the people. It is fit, however, even now, to bring this reasoning under review, because it inculcates upon us the important lesson, how little reliance can be placed upon mere theory in any matters of government; and how difficult it is to vindicate the most sound, practical doctrines against the specious questioning of ingenuity and hostility.—Story on the Constitution, section 648.

I will read no further from that section, but turning now to the subject of the numbers which should compose the House of Representatives, I beg leave to call attention to what he said:

But the question itself, what is the proper and convenient number to compose a representative legislature, is as little susceptible of a precise solution as any which can be stated in the whole circle of politics. There is no point upon which different nations are more at variance; and the policy of the American States themselves, on this subject, while they were colonies, and since they have become independent, has been exceedingly discordant. Independent of the differences arising from the population and size of the States, there will be found to be great diversities among those whose population and size nearly approach each other.

* * * * * * *

It is by no means true that a large representation is necessary to understand the interests of the people. It is not either theoretically or practically true that a knowledge of those interests is augmented in proportion to the increase of representatives. The interests of the State of New York are probably as well understood by its sixty-five representatives as those of Massachusetts by its three or four hundred. In fact, higher qualifications will usually be sought and required where the representatives are few than where they are many. And there will also be a higher ambition to serve where the smallness of the number creates a desirable distinction than where it is shared with many, and of course individual importance is essentially diminished.—Ibid., sections 651, 653, 678.

And Kent, speaking upon this subject, well expresses the principle which should guide in the formation of a House of Representatives:

A due acquaintance with the local interests of every part of the Union ought to be carried into the House, and a sufficient number collected for all the purposes of information, discussion, and diffusive sympathy with the wants and wishes of the people. When these objects are obtained any further increase neither promotes deliberation nor increases the public safety. All numerous bodies of men, although selected with the greatest care, are too much swayed by passion, and too impatient of protracted deliberation.—1 Kent, 232.

The history and policy of our American Congress in the main has tended to an increase of its representation. The older States, for the purpose of not losing Representatives, for the purpose of not losing political power, and to keep pace with the more rapidly growing States of the West and Northwest, have always favored such apportionment of representation as would save to them the number of Representatives which they had whenever the question of apportionment came up.

The first apportionment act passed in 1792, three years after the Constitution went into operation, fixed one member for every 33,000 people, and gave us a House of 105 members. In 1802 the same ratio was maintained, which gave us a House of 141 members. In 1811 the ratio of one member for every 35,000 population was adopted, which gave us a House of 181 members. In 1822 the ratio of 40,000 was adopted, which gave us a House of 212 members. In 1832 the ratio of 47,700 was adopted, which gave us a House of 240 members. In 1842 we dropped for a decade, and in the apportionment bill of that year the ratio of representation was 70,680, which gave us a House of 223 members. In 1850 the ratio was 93,420, which gave us a House of 233 members. In 1862 the ratio was 126,823, which gave us a House of 241 members. And in 1872 the ratio was 131,425, which gives us the present House of 293 members.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is it policy, is it wisdom, to increase still further the membership of this House? Have we not reached a limit where we should pause for a while? Will business be dispatched more rapidly by increasing our numbers? Will more wisdom mark our deliberations? Will there be more order? Will roll-calls take less time? Will it be less expensive? Under our Constitution the Senate of the United States must pass upon every bill which passes this House; it must adopt the same legislative methods upon every measure. In addition to that it must act upon every nomination sent to it by the Executive—no inconsiderable duty of late years. The Senate is also a part of the treaty-making power of the nation, and is the sole court for the trial of all impeachments. Yet, with these additional duties, who will say that the Senate of the United States, with only seventy-six members, does not dispatch business with as much promptness and with as much wisdom and deliberation as this House, with its two hundred and ninety-three members?

Let me take one illustration more as to the policy of an increase. The State which I have the honor in part to represent, New York, an empire in itself—with all the industrial and material interests which go to constitute a great commonwealth—has never found it political wisdom to increase the size of its Legislature. From 1789, when its population was only 340,112, down to 1821, the numbers constituting its legislative bodies were substantially the same. In 1821, when its population was 1,372,812, it created a Legislature whose senate consisted of thirty-two members, and an assembly of one hundred and twenty-eight members only. Although, in 1846, when its population had increased to 2,604,495, it changed its constitution and held a constitutional convention—in 1867, and afterward, a constitutional commission, when its population had doubled. Yet New York, in its wisdom, is to-day transacting its public business with a Legislature of the size fixed in 1821; and now, with a population of 5,083,810, adhering to a Legislature created sixty years ago, who will say that New York is not as rich, great, prosperous, and populous, and as well governed, as any of her sister States or as this Union, which, by its Congress, has increased its representation at every decade.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to apportionment at this session of Congress. In section 2 of article 14 of the amendment to the Constitution it is provided that—

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives of Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Every apportionment bill pending in this House bases representation upon numbers only. That was the principle of the old Constitution, under which nine censuses were taken and nine apportionments made; but under section 2 of the fourteenth amendment voters as well as numbers may be taken into the account in apportioning Representatives among the respective States; and when any State denies to any of its qualified male citizens, being twenty-one years of age, the right to vote for any of the officers specified in the fourteenth amendment, in my judgment that State should be denied representation in this House in the proportion which it denies the right of voting to any of its male citizens otherwise qualified. [Applause.]

Turning to the constitutions of the States, we find that Massachusetts and Connecticut disqualify citizens on educational grounds. I am not going to criticise the wisdom of those States. I am not standing here to attack either of those States or any others; and let me say in passing that the question of education is becoming one of the paramount questions of the present time. Thoughtful men, who are anxious for the perpetuity of our institutions, who are looking to the future welfare of this Republic, are scanning closely the Constitution to find whether or not there are any powers in it authorizing Congress to take control of the whole subject of education for the nation and for all the States of the nation. But let me say that while Massachusetts and Connecticut have imposed an educational qualification which debars certain citizens in those States from voting for the officers enumerated in section 2 of the fourteenth amendment, Massachusetts, Delaware, Georgia, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia have added a property qualification, either in regard to amount of property which the voter shall possess, or in regard to the payment of poll taxes, or county, State, or municipal taxes.

Let me call attention somewhat to the effect of this in regard to representation in this House. The State which I have the honor to represent in part upon this floor sends here under the apportionment act of 1872 thirty-three Representatives. In the last election of those Representatives the total vote for Representatives in Congress in each of those thirty-three districts was not less than 23,000; and in the Erie district, where the highest vote was cast, there was a little upward of 45,000 votes cast for candidates for Representative in this House.

Now turn to the State of Rhode Island. Rhode Island in the last presidential election cast 29,210 votes, all told, for the presidential electors, and both of the members from the first and second congressional districts of that State had had cast for them and for their opponents all told in both of those districts only 28,964 votes. That is the aggregate of both districts. In twenty-three of the congressional districts of the State of New York there was a larger vote than 28,964 cast for congressional candidates in each and every one of those twenty-three congressional districts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] chairman of the Committee on Census, in his speech yesterday, which was able and exhaustive, on this question, asks, in regard to the effect of the fourteenth amendment, a question which I think should receive an answer at this time and in this place. And that I may do him no injustice I read from the RECORD what purports to be his remarks on that question:

The first question which arises under this second section of the fourteenth amendment is, What is a denial or abridgment of the right to vote as contemplated? Must it be by law or by individuals? What constitutes a denial or abridgment if otherwise than by law? What is the amount of private force and intimidation, or the kind of device or fraud which constitutes a denial or abridgment? The last act of apportionment was passed on the 2d of February, 1872. It did not pretend to settle this or anything else as to this fourteenth amendment. It re-enacted the clause of the Constitution, and fixed the power which must deny or abridge.

It says "should any State" deny or abridge. It does not say person or community or other organism; so that, in so far as any interpretation may be drawn from the law of 1872, the only constraint on suffrage must be from the State and by legal enactment. No practical application has been made of the constitutional clause or the law. It has been hitherto a dead letter. Nor is it possible now, with any known data ascertainable with reasonable accuracy, to apply either the Constitution or the law to the apportionment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair.) The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask, by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that my colleague's time be extended for ten minutes.

Mr. ROBESON. I hope no limit will be placed upon the gentleman's time, but that he will be permitted to go on until he has concluded his speech.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. CROWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for its courtesy in extending me this privilege.

Now, let me say, sir, that the answer to the question asked by the chairman of the Committee on Census has been given by the Supreme Court of the United States at the October term in 1879, in the matter of the Commonwealth of Virginia and J. D. Coles, petitioner. That was a writ of habeas corpus, coming up from the State of Virginia, in regard to a county judge in one of the counties of that State, who was charged with having refused to select jurors under the provisions of the recent amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

The Supreme Court in rendering judgment—Justice Strong delivering the opinion—holds in regard to that the following, to which I particularly ask the attention of the House. In speaking of these recent constitutional amendments, and the legislation necessary to carry them into operation, the court observes "all of the amendments derive much of their force from this latter provision." That is, the provision existing in Congress to pass appropriate legislation to enforce them:

It is not said the judicial power of the General Government shall extend to enforcing the prohibitions and to protecting the rights and immunities guaranteed. It is not said that branch of the Government shall be authorized to declare void any action of a State in violation of the prohibitions. It is the power of Congress which has been enlarged. Congress is authorized to enforce the prohibitions by appropriate legislation. Some legislation is contemplated to make the amendments fully effective. Whatever legislation is appropriate, that is, adapted to carry out the objects the amendments have in view—whatever tends to enforce submission to the prohibitions they contain, and to secure to all persons the enjoyment of perfect equality of civil rights, and the equal protection of the laws against State denial or invasion, if not prohibited—is brought within the domain of congressional power. Nor does it make any difference that such legislation is restrictive of what the State might have done before the constitutional amendment was adopted.

And let me say here, all these constitutional qualifications or limitations which exist in these ten States I have named, I believe without exception, unless in the case of one or two of them, were passed before the adoption of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution:

The prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment are directed to the States, and they are to a degree restrictions of State power. It is these which Congress is empowered to enforce, and to enforce against State action, however put forth, whether that action be executive, legislative, or judicial. Such enforcement is no invasion of State sovereignty. No law can be which the people of the States have, by the Constitution of the United States, empowered Congress to enact. This extent of the powers of the General Government is overlooked when it is said, as it has been in this case, that the act of March 1, 1875, interferes with State rights. It is said the selection of jurors for her courts and the administration of her laws belong to each State; that they are her rights. This is true in the general; but in exercising her rights a State cannot disregard the limitations which the Federal Constitution has applied to her power. Her rights do not reach to that extent. Nor can she deny to the General Government the right to exercise all its granted powers, though they may interfere with the full enjoyment of rights she would have if those powers had not been thus granted. Indeed, every addition of power to the General Government involves a corresponding diminution of the governmental powers of the States. It is carved out of them.

We have said the prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment are addressed to the States. They are "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; * * * nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

And now the court, in passing upon the exact phraseology used in section 2 of the fourteenth amendment, say:

A State acts by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision, therefore, must mean that no agency of the State, or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted, shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever by virtue of public position under a State government deprives another of property, life, or liberty, without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition, and as he acts in the name and for the State, and is clothed with the State's power, his act is that of the State. This must be so or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning. Then the State has clothed one of its agents with power to annul or to evade it.

But the constitutional amendment was ordained for a purpose. It was to secure equal rights to all persons; and to insure to all persons the enjoyments of such rights power was given to Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. Such legislation must act upon persons, not upon the abstract thing denominated a State, but upon the persons who are the agents of the State in the denial of the rights which were intended to be secured.

In 1876, in the fierce struggle for political power in this country, it was supposed that every State in the Union had polled its full vote for President in that year. New York, my own State, cast upward of a million in that election, the largest vote ever cast up to the election of 1880. Four years pass away. We have another presidential election in 1880, and it is fair to assume that the lapse of four years would have brought increased numbers of voters in all of the States of the Union, but it will be found that in certain States the vote cast in 1880 for presidential electors is considerably less than that cast in 1876. I have stated as a reason for my opposition to the passage of any apportionment bill by this Congress that every one of these bills for the apportionment of Representatives is based upon numbers without taking into the count voters. Under the Constitution as amended, I regard voters as well as numbers a basis for an apportionment bill, where citizens are denied the right to vote by State action. I am not speaking in a partisan sense; but it is alleged and believed that in some parts of the Union, in some of the States in this Union or in some sections of the country, there exists and has existed fraud, intimidation, and violence, by which means a large number of voters have been denied the right of voting in elections in the past. I do not assert, sir, whether that is so or not. The allegation has been made, and it is believed in a portion of this Union that this condition of affairs absolutely exists.

Now, every one of the twenty-two States of the North increased its vote in 1880 over that cast in 1876; but when we come to certain States of this Union, the sixteen Southern States, we find that some of them have fallen off largely in the number of voters in the election of 1880 as compared with what they cast in 1876. South Carolina did not poll within 12,246 votes as many in 1880 as she did in 1876; Alabama did not poll within 18,725 as many as she did in 1876; Virginia did not poll within 22,483 votes in 1880 as she did in the preceding election in 1876; Georgia did not poll within 24,879 votes in 1880 as she did in 1876; Louisiana did not poll within 48,442 votes in 1880 as she did in 1876; Mississippi did not poll within 48,377 votes as many in 1880 as she did in 1876. For myself, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of having one of the committees of this Congress, or a select committee, if you please, raised for that purpose, which shall investigate the whole question of disqualification, either educational or property, in all these States of the Union where constitutional prohibitions against the right of suffrage are alleged to exist; and I would have this committee look into this whole question and report to Congress what qualifications or disqualifications exist in all sections of the country to deprive citizens of the right to vote; and then when we have a full report of the disqualifications, either educational or property, or whether by violence and oppression men are denied the right of suffrage, and all of the facts before us, it will then be within the power of Congress to go to work and consider an apportionment bill which can be based upon justice, equity, and the Constitution, based upon the voters of this country as well as upon the numbers.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] in his exceedingly able speech, asks the question, suggested by way of illustration, that if the State of Pennsylvania should choose to impose a property qualification it might disfranchise all of Pennsylvania, and there would be no voter in Pennsylvania whatever. Well, Mr. Speaker, if that should become a fact, Pennsylvania would be to blame and not the Constitution or the General Government. Let Pennsylvania remove her property disqualifications and put herself upon the same basis that twenty-eight other States stand upon, and then that objection will be obviated as to Pennsylvania.

Only four weeks of this session of Congress are left. Certainly within that time the qualifications or disqualifications existing in ten States of this Union, or the fraud, violence, and intimidation alleged to exist in other States, cannot be properly investigated and considered, nor can we have all the facts in such proper shape before the House as to permit an apportionment bill based upon voters as well as upon numbers. One other reason why I am opposed to any of these bills, or rather to the majority bill reported by the committee, is because it does not provide that the district system shall be maintained. And let me pause here and ask the gentleman whether in the amendment which he has indicated his intention to offer (to make the number of Representatives three hundred and seven) he intends to incorporate in that the district system?

Mr. COX. I will answer the gentleman. My amendment is to the original bill which I introduced, for three hundred and one members. That has now those two sections. I propose to retain those two sections, and so to amend the original bill as to leave them in, only amending the first section, as you will perceive.

Mr. CROWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the gentleman so says, because I can most heartily and cordially sustain that proposition for the establishment of a district system. In 1842, as the gentleman who preceded me said, this question of the district system was discussed with much deliberation and in extenso in both branches of Congress. This dogma of State rights which has come before Congress every once in a while for now nearly one hundred years was brought up in that discussion, and it was settled by the weight of discussion, under section 4, article 1 of the Constitution, which says:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

It was settled, I say, by the weight of deliberation, or rather by the weight of argument, and incorporated in section 2 of the act of 1842, that Congress had the power of prescribing to the States the manner in which Representatives should be chosen in the different States of the Union. Prior to that time the States regulated that matter for themselves. Some of them elected by districts; some of them, I think, although I am not certain of that now, elected by Legislatures; certainly some of them elected by a general ticket. Why the wisdom of adopting the district system? The report of the majority of this committee leaves this whole question a blank. You elect your Representatives by a general ticket, and then you have a State representation instead of a district representation. More than that, you leave it to the States to say of what territory each district shall be composed. And they may make one district for political purposes consist of 200,000 people, if you please; or, if the ratio is not so high as that, they may make it consist of what the ratio may be, while they make another district consist of 50,000 people, and another of 100,000, and thus work inequalities and injustices in the election of Representatives throughout the country.

More than that, if you say you will not have this district system and that the district shall not be composed of contiguous territory, you put it in the power of the respective State Legislatures to say that they will take one county in one end of a State and attach it to another county at another end of a State, and thus overwhelm or drown out the political sentiment of a locality. By way of illustration, they may take a ward which gives 10,000 democratic majority in the city of New York and attach it to the district of my colleague in Syracuse, which gives about three thousand or four thousand republican majority, and drown out the republican majority in the district and thwart the wishes of the majority of the people in that locality.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have as much faith in the wisdom of State Legislatures and in the wisdom of the people of localities as any gentleman. But in reading our political history, let me say that when men are engaged in a fierce strife for political power they do those things which are unjust and which they would not do in their calmer moments.

Let me read to you briefly what so great a man, so patriotic a man, indeed one of the greatest men, if not the greatest man this country ever produced—Alexander Hamilton—proposed to do at a time when it was necessary, in his judgment, to thwart the majority of the American people in the election of Mr. Jefferson as President. Hammond in his history on political parties in the State of New York says, speaking of the election of Mr. Jefferson:

> Immediately after the result of the State election was known, and on the 7th day of May, General Hamilton, with the approbation, as is said, of a caucus of his political friends in New York, addressed a letter to Governor Jay, requesting and urging him forthwith to call the then existing Legislature together, with a view that before the legislative year expired (and it will be remembered that under the old constitution it expired on the 1st of July) they should pass an act dividing the States into districts for the choice of presidential electors by the people. It was supposed, and the event proved the supposition well founded, that Mr. Jefferson could not get, including the twelve New York votes, more than seventy-three votes, and seventy votes were necessary to a choice. If, therefore, four Federal votes could be obtained in this State (and that there could, if the State was divided into districts, did not admit of any doubt) the election of Jefferson would be defeated. Mr. Hamilton, in his letter, uses this extraordinary language, "You, sir, know in a great degree the anti-Federal party; but I fear you do not know them as well as I do. It is a composition, indeed, of very incongruous materials, but all tending to mischief—some of them to the overthrow of the Government by stripping it of its due energies," [Jeffersonians,] "others of them" [Burr] "a revolution after the manner of Bonaparte. I speak from indubitable facts, not from conjecture and inference." How General Hamilton could feel authorized to make these bold, and as all will now admit, unwarrantable assertions, to such a man as Governor Jay, it is difficult to conceive. He concluded by urging the Governor to make the call as the only remaining means of saving the nation.

If so great and patriotic a man as Alexander Hamilton, to thwart the wishes of the people and gain political power, could urge a measure of this kind, say not to me that in the struggles through which we have passed, in the struggles which probably await us, Legislatures will not gerrymander their States for the purpose of securing political power—and I am not saying whether that will be done by republicans or democrats or any political party which may come after them. I am simply saying that in the light of the political history of this country, in the light of the history of the respective States, it is wise and constitutional for this Congress to say that we shall elect the Representatives to this body by districts composed of contiguous territory and as equal as may be in population; while on the other hand if we throw open the doors to all these possible evils which may result from any other system it will not be good statesmanship nor wise legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for listening to me much longer than I had intended to trespass upon its time. I am nearly through.

Let me say that large deliberative assemblies, large legislative bodies, have not tended to the dispatch of business in any country in the world, have not tended to political wisdom. Nothing of that kind marks this Hungarian legislature of which I have spoken. Nothing of the kind marks, to the degree which it ought, the deliberations of the great Parliament of Great Britain. The French Corps Legislatif has become so turbulent as almost to cease, as I said before, to be a deliberative legislative body.

Our American Congress as it stands to-day, even with the disqualifications existing in the several States and with the fraud and intimidation which it is charged exists in some of the States of this Union, is the most truly representative legislative body, in my judgment, in the world. Let us have all the facts of disqualifications in all the States; let us have, as far as we can ascertain it, a knowledge of the intimidation and fraud which are alleged to be committed in any portion of this country properly placed before this body, and then in the passage of an apportionment bill we can make it so wise, so just, so strong, that we can make this Chamber of Representatives, this American Congress, what it ought to be, and what I believe it is destined to be, the freest and grandest parliamentary body in the world. [Great applause.]

Mr. RAY. If I understood correctly, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWLEY] included the State of New Hampshire among those which imposed property qualifications. That is a mistake. New Hampshire has had no property qualification touching the right of suffrage since 1852.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, being a member of the committee to which this matter was referred, and being probably more responsible than any member of that committee for the bill presented by the majority, I feel that I ought to state to the House the reasons in support of it which induced its adoption. I have no set speech to make, none written and none printed. I only wish to present to the House, in support of the majority report of the committee, such opinions as may occur to me during the course of the remarks which I may make.

I have listened to the gentleman on the other side of the House who has just closed his speech, [Mr. CROWLEY,] and to the objections which he has urged against our bill. It seems to me that all the positions which he has taken are unsound and cannot be maintained. The first objection, I believe, which he urges to the majority report made by the Select Committee on the Census, in favor of a House of three hundred and eleven, is that it proposes an increase of the members of this House beyond its present number.

Now I know that each gentleman entertains his own views on the subject of the number of members which should constitute this House. I believe that in the decision of that question we should be guided not exclusively by our own personal interests or the interests of our State or of the section of the country in which we live. I do hope that the question of sectional interests will play no part in the decision of this question—one of the most important, I think, ever submitted to us for our judgment.

I know it has been said that this is a question of mathematical calculation. But it involves likewise a redistribution of the political power of this country, a redistribution back to the States of the power given to them by the Constitution affecting their right to participate in the government of this country. I believe that we have more to fear from a reduction of this House than from its extension, and if I had to vote for either the one or the other I should prefer that the increase of this House should go to five hundred members than that it should be reduced a single one.

I believe, and I hope that the House will concur with me in those views, that at each decade, as we go forward increasing in population, the House of Representatives ought to respond in some measure by its increase in numbers to that increase in numbers in the several States. We have since the last census increased in population in this country over eleven millions. Are we not to increase the members of this House to correspond to that? Will we make a Procrustean bed upon which we are to lay this House, to "cabin, crib, and confine" it—to say, "beyond this you shall not go?" Are we to lay down any particular number, and say that inside of that number it can progress, but beyond that limit it shall never pass? Can this House respond to the demands made by the country upon it if it is to be made an exclusive body of that kind? Should it not be an epitome of the people? Is it not to respond at every election to the changes in public sentiment upon every question brought before the people?

Take the next House. Gentlemen claim, some of them, that we are to have a minority representation in that House. A bill has been presented to the House for that purpose. I believe that whole idea is perfectly Utopian, one not required, one for which there is no necessity at this time. I do not believe this House will adopt any such plan. I do not know that the plan will be forced upon the House for its consideration. I do not know that the gentleman who presented it will ever press it further upon the consideration of the House. I do not believe the House is prepared to accept it, or that there is a necessity now which demands it.

Is not this House now, and will not the next House be, a fair representation of public sentiment? If you will take the political complexion of the next House you will find that according to the best calculations made it will have a republican majority of one over all other political parties, counting the House upon a strict party vote. On the popular vote Garfield did not receive quite a majority, but local influences and personal popularity will easily account for the majority of one in the House. The political divisions into States, counties, and districts for local purposes insures the minority fair representation. The history of the country shows this conclusively. Now, why should we abandon the district system which has been in operation for the last forty years? Why should we change that system and adopt the plan of minority representation, which has been suggested by some, when the relative strength of all political parties is fairly represented in the complexion of the House year after year with unvarying certainty?

But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who last addressed us seemed uneasy for fear something might be done to break down the district system. He wanted to know why the majority of this select committee struck from the bill presented by its chairman those two clauses. I will tell him. It was to escape the argument and discussion which may follow if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] undertakes to attach to this bill the measure which he has presented to us for minority representation. We saw no reason—and this is the explanation of our action—we saw no reason why the long and tedious discussion which that bill would involve should be injected here in the closing hours of this Congress. We did not understand it to be necessary that that question should be now determined. We did not understand that question to be germane to the apportionment bill, which is a mere distribution of the members among the States according to the rule prescribed by the Constitution.

Nor do we find any necessity that the law on that subject should be now re-enacted. Do not gentlemen well know that there is an independent act on this subject, passed July 14, 1862, which now stands on the statute-book unrepealed? Why should we pile statute upon statute to secure the same thing? This provision having been passed in 1842, repassed in 1852, and, though unrepealed, repassed again in 1862 by an independent statute, why should we re-enact such a provision in this apportionment bill? Is that necessary to make the bill more effective? I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read the statute of 1862 to which I have referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act in relation to the election of Representatives to Congress by single districts.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in each State entitled in the next and any succeeding Congress to more than one Representative, the number to which such State is or may be hereafter entitled shall be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory, equal in number to the number of Representatives to which said State may be entitled in the Congress for which said election is held, no one district electing more than one Representative: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the State of California, so far as it may affect the election of Representatives to the Thirty-eighth Congress: And provided further, That in the election of Representatives to the Thirty-eighth Congress from the State of Illinois, the additional Representative allowed to said State by an act entitled "An act fixing the number of the House of Representatives from and after the 3d day of March, 1863," approved March 4, 1862, may be elected by the State at large, and the other thirteen Representatives, to which the State is entitled by the districts as now prescribed by law in said State, unless the Legislature of said State should otherwise provide before the time fixed by law for the election of Representatives therein.

Approved, July 14, 1862.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Speaker, with that act standing upon the statute-book unrepealed, also of 1842 and 1852, I see no necessity for pressing the matter further upon the House.

Mr. SHERWIN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERWIN. When was that statute enacted?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. July 14, 1862.

Mr. SHERWIN. Is it embraced in the Revised Statutes?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. No, sir.

Mr. SHERWIN. How, then, can it be in force now?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Because the Revised Statutes do not repeal any independent laws which they do not touch. If the gentleman will turn to the enacting clause of the Revised Statues he will find that by the terms of that revision this law is left in force.

Mr. SHERWIN. In the act of 1872 fixing the apportionment the provision that the districts shall be composed of contiguous territory is confined to that apportionment alone.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. This is the act of 1862, not the act of 1872. It is an independent law and not embraced in or repealed by the Revised Statutes.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not see why we should go into this matter at all. It is a dangerous subject, to say the least of it, when we see what progress has been made in this direction by the legislation of Congress during the last forty years. The year 1842 was the first time that Congress ever undertook to interfere with the regulations of the States on this subject. Then it was that the moiety system was first adopted, giving to each State on even divisions so many Representatives, and to each State having a fraction greater than one-half an additional member. At that time another change was introduced. Theretofore, whenever it was necessary to apportion representation, the ratio was first found, the populations of the States divided by that ratio, and whatever number of members they might obtain by that division was given to them. Then for the first time a limit was fixed upon the membership of this House, the number being fixed at two hundred and forty-one, and the ratio being adopted to produce that result. Theretofore a ratio was determined and the number of members was left to be what it might under the ratio determined. A new system was devised, carrying with it the moiety system, or some system allowing fractional representation. Then for the first time what is now known as the district system was adopted. How have we progressed in our legislation on this subject! We have gone on until Congress has assumed almost entire control of the election of members in the States. In 1870, 1871, and 1872, when the republican party was in power in both branches of Congress, they seized upon this whole subject; they forced upon the States the ballot system, which many of them do not like, and which produces more fraud in one day than the viva voce system will in a hundred years, as those of us who have lived under both systems well know. We hear more of fraud, corruption, ballot-box stuffing, and intimidation in a single contested-election case in this House than the whole State of Kentucky furnishes in all our elections for State officers during twenty-five years.

Is it wise for this House to interfere? What is the object? Congress has thus interfered to direct the States as to the time when they shall elect their Representatives, fixing a uniform day, thereby throwing the power and control of the Federal Government, with its innumerable supervisors and deputy marshals, into the State elections which occur on the same day. Then came the legislation providing for supervisors and deputy marshals, of whom we have heard so much. Complete machinery has been provided by the central Government here to dominate the States in their elections. I am opposed to this interference on the part of the Government with the States, even for the purpose of dictating to them that they shall elect by districts. It is inconsistent with the theory upon which our Government is based. If you will go back and look at the history of that provision in the Constitution under which this action is had, you will find that nine out of the thirteen original States which adopted that Constitution adopted it with the distinct understanding that Congress never would exercise that latent power except for the purpose of self-preservation, as in cases where a State refuses to elect Representatives, or from some other cause could not.

Under what section of the Constitution, Mr. Speaker, does Congress claim power to pass these clauses regulating the elections of Representatives by the States? There is but one; in these words:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

And no provision of that instrument aroused so much opposition to its adoption by the States as this. Nearly all the conventions placed upon record their solemn protest against its use being ever resorted to, except as a matter of self-preservation. Opposition was not confined to sections. In fact, State rights had its birth and earliest propagandist and defender among the New England States and around Plymouth Rock. Massachusetts, in her convention, said:

The convention do, therefore, recommend that the following alterations and provisions be introduced into the said Constitution:

"SEC. 3. That Congress do not exercise the powers vested in them by the fourth section of the first article, but in cases when a State shall neglect or refuse to make the regulations therein mentioned, or shall make regulations subversive of the rights of the people to a free and equal representation in Congress, agreeably to the Constitution."

Thus it will be seen the old State of Massachusetts, always zealous of her rights as a State, left a record to future Congresses, in the following language:

And the convention do, in the name and in behalf of the people of this Commonwealth, enjoin it upon their Representatives in Congress, at all times, until the alterations and provisions aforesaid shall have been considered, agreeably to the fifth article of the said Constitution, to exert all their influence, and use all reasonable and legal methods, to attain a ratification of the said alterations and provisions, in such manner as is provided in the said article.

I will take South Carolina next—and part of the record of her convention, which adopted the Constitution for her people:

And whereas it is essential to the preservation of the rights reserved to the several States, and the freedom of the people, under the operations of a general government, that the right of prescribing the manner, time, and places of holding the elections to the Federal Legislature, should be forever inseparably annexed to the sovereignty of the several States, this convention doth declare that the same ought to remain, to all posterity, a perpetual and fundamental right in the local exclusive of the interference of the General Government, except in cases where the Legislatures of the States shall refuse or neglect to perform and fulfill the same, according to the tenor of the said Constitution.

It is grandly sublime to study the history of those times and men after a new nation had been born, to note the unanimity of sentiment of their jealous vigilance for the rights of the States and the people. The instruction of the convention to its Representatives in Congress is of no doubtful meaning, namely:

Resolved, That it is a standing instruction to all such delegates as may hereafter be elected to represent this State in the General Government to exert their utmost abilities and influence to effect an alteration of the Constitution conformably to the aforegoing resolutions.

The State of New Hampshire follows next, whose conventions took under consideration this particular section of the Constitution, and upon her record are found the following emphatic entries:

The convention do therefore recommend that the following alterations and provisions be introduced into the said Constitution: 3. That Congress do not exercise the powers vested in them by the fourth section of the first article but in case when a State shall neglect or refuse to make the regulations therein mentioned, or shall make regulations subversive of the rights of the people to a free and equal representation in Congress; nor shall Congress in any case make regulations contrary to a free and equal representation.

And the convention do, in the name and in behalf of the people of this State, enjoin it upon their Representatives in Congress at all times until the alterations and provisions aforesaid have been considered agreeably to the fifth article of the said Constitution, to exert all their influence and use all reasonable and legal methods to obtain a ratification of the said alterations and provisions in such manner as is provided in the said article.

The wise statesmanship of Virginia, whose vigilance and prudence had a controlling influence from the Declaration of Independence in 1776 to the adoption of the Constitution in 1787 has left upon its record a declaration on this amendment strong, emphatic, and to the point, in the following words, namely:

XVI. The Congress shall not alter, modify, or interfere in the times, places, or manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, or either of them, except when the Legislature of any State shall neglect, refuse, or be disabled by invasion or rebellion to prescribe the same.

They placed upon the same record a perpetual instruction to their future Representatives in Congress of the United States, namely:

And the convention do, in the name and behalf of the people of this Commonwealth, enjoin it upon their Representatives in Congress to exert all their influence, and use all reasonable and legal methods, to obtain a ratification of the foregoing alterations and provisions, in the manner provided by the fifth article of the said Constitution; and in all congressional laws to be passed in the mean time, to conform to the spirit of these amendments, as far as the said Constitution will admit.

The next in order is now one of the most powerful and influential States in the Union; and I ask to be pardoned for quoting from a distinguished Senator from the State of Louisiana, Mr. White, who I believe was a native of New York, when he said he "referred with pride and pleasure to the proceedings of her convention upon this important point:"

New York was not then a large State in the comparison; and yet the cautious jealousy of her statesmen against this wanton exercise of Federal power over her local elections was not the less, because she had at that day the less to fear and to lose from the assumption. Her record is more full as to this grant of power than that of any other State, as her convention seem to design to set up every guard against an abuse of its exercise. They therefore, in express terms, first put their construction upon the clause of the Constitution as they found it, in the following language, to wit: "That nothing contained in the said Constitution is to be construed to prevent the Legislature of any State from passing laws at its discretion, from time to time, to divide such State into convenient districts, and to apportion its Representatives to and among such districts.

After this emphatic declaration of the rights of the States, the convention of New York proceeded to make their ratification of the Constitution in this language:

Under these impressions, and declaring that the rights aforesaid are consistent with the said Constitution, and in confidence that the amendments which shall have been proposed to said Constitution will receive an early and mature consideration, we, the said delegates, in the name and in the behalf of the people of the State of New York, do, by these presents, assent to and ratify the said Constitution. In full confidence, nevertheless, that, until a convention shall be called and convened for proposing amendments to the said Constitution * * * that the Congress will not make or alter any regulation in this State respecting the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators or Representatives, unless the Legislature of this State shall neglect or refuse to make laws or regulations for the purpose, or from any circumstance be incapable of making the same; and that in those cases such power will only be exercised until the Legislature of this State shall make provisions in the premises.

The convention of New York went even further than this. They looked forward with prophetic vision at the encroachments of the Federal power, and to warn them of the danger of centralization they proceeded to instruct their future Representatives against that encroachment, to wit:

And the convention do, in the name and behalf of the people of the State of New York, enjoin it upon their Representatives in the Congress to exert all their influence and use all reasonable means to obtain a ratification of the following amendments to the said Constitution in the manner prescribed therein, and in all laws to be passed by Congress, in the mean time, to conform to the spirit of the said amendments, as far as the Constitution will admit.

The amendment proposed by the convention follows, and is in this language, namely:

That the Congress shall not make or alter any regulation in any State, respecting the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators or Representatives, unless the Legislature of such State shall neglect or refuse to make laws or regulations for the purpose, or from any circumstance be incapable of making the same; and then only until the Legislature of such State shall make provisions in the premises: Provided, That Congress may prescribe the time for the election of Representatives.

On that account, Mr. Speaker, because there is no necessity that this law shall be re-enacted by this Congress because it endangers this apportionment bill and may prolong indefinitely this debate, because, to say the least of it, it is of doubtful constitutionality, because it is almost in the nature of things where any State dares to violate it, which she may do, we can do no more than exclude her Representatives from the halls of the House, I hope it will not be insisted upon. I ask these gentlemen who now contend so stubbornly for it, suppose a State, according to the rule as you understand it, does not make her territory contiguous; or suppose every district of that State is based on contiguous territory save one, are you going to exclude all the members of such a State because she has not complied in one instance with what you understand to be the requirement of this law? This power was given to you to bring members into Congress, not to drive them out. Will you turn around and use it for that purpose? Will you say to New York, with thirty-three members here upon this floor, if your Legislature does not square itself according to the rule which we prescribe we will exclude your thirty-three members, although you have five million people, and they will go unrepresented upon this floor? How do you propose to do it? Is it not a brutum fulmen which you issue against the State, directing them to do this thing without the power on your part except by the exclusion of its representation to compel it to do it?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have but little more, if anything, to say on that subject. I do not wish to invoke sectional issues here, nor do I wish to get up a partisan strife on this subject; but I do say, as the law stands on the statute-book it gives to gentlemen on the other side all they ask, and it is unnecessary to ask us on this side to re-enact it, or meddle with elections in the States against the protest of our forefathers, made, as it has been, so often and so emphatically.

The other objection alleged by the gentleman from New York against the bill of the majority was, if I recollect aright, the increase of the number of the House. That is a question, of course, which each member must consider for himself, and we have all equal lights before us and can form each our own opinion as to whether the country can be better served by a smaller or larger House. I listened to what he had to say on that subject, and when he cited his own great State with a small Legislature, as he said, probably one that dates back for sixty years and not increased through that whole time, as a fair sample of what a State can be and what it can do with a small Legislature, I thought it was a little unfortunate, because out in our part of the world at least New York is not considered the freest State from fraud, nor her Legislature the most incorruptible in the Union. We have never heard any charge against New Hampshire, which I believe has a Legislature like a great big town-meeting, like that which is made against the Legislature of New York, of having big railroad bills and measures for railroad interests lobbied through it, and that men were elected to it who were controlled and held in hand and sent there, as it is understood, to be in a large measure the attorneys and promoters of railroad corporations and banking interests. I do not know it would be better for his State to have an increased representation in her Legislature, but I am satisfied it would do her no harm.

As far as we of the committee are concerned, and at least as far as I personally am concerned in reference to the number of Representatives, I do not ask nor demand the House to be increased to any extraordinary number. It certainly seems to me when we increase the number eighteen, as the majority bill in this House proposes to do on an increased population of 11,000,000, it is asking no big increase, because it fixes the representation at over five hundred and fifty thousand population for each of the new members who can enter this House on account of the increase. Is that increase an expansion too far? Do we not derive some practical benefit from it? Have we not the history of the world before us, which shows a large representative body is a safer and greater protector to the liberties of the people than a smaller one? The gentleman would like to reduce this House within the narrow limits of the Senate. Are we to have no popular branch of this Government; and are the people to have no voice in it? Are we to hold it up as a model republic, and at the same time stifle the direct voice of the people? Where else is their power directly felt in our system of government save in this House alone?

You may take your President, your Supreme Court, and you may take the Senate, and the power of the people is not felt directly there. They are elected in the first place for a long period of time. The Senator is elected for six years, the President for four. The people do not elect either. They do not rest upon them. The President is elected through the intricate machinery of the electoral college or directly by the vote of the States, where the electors have failed to choose. His election rests upon the States, and only indirectly upon the people. Four years of time must pass before he can respond again to a change in sentiment.

Take the Senate. They are not the people's representatives. They are the representatives of the States, elected by their State Legislatures, and for a period of six years. They do not respond to the change in public sentiment, as we well know. Public sentiment may change time and again upon great measures of national importance during the course of his senatorial career, and there is no power in the people to change the man upon the floor of the Senate to correspond to this change in public sentiment.

Take, again, the Supreme Court, the co-ordinate branch of the Government. How is it selected? They are appointed by the Executive and confirmed by the Senate—all removed far away from the people. They have no part with the people, nor have they any interest with them in the question of representation. The people have nothing to do with it, have no power over them. They are placed in that position by the powers not directly responsible or representing the people, and remain there until they are retired or removed by impeachment or resignation or death. They are absolutely independent of any change of public sentiment or of requirements of the people. They are masters of the situation. As far as it has been possible we have retained the system of democratic government, but it will be found that it exists only in the House of Representatives. All these other branches, as I have shown, are upon an entirely different basis; and are we now to strike down the only popular branch of representation? Are we, as some gentleman suggests, to narrow it down to the narrow limit of two hundred and fifty, or even less, as some recommend? Do not we stand up as the only power that is able to withstand the increasing power and prerogatives of the executive and judicial branches of the Government? Are we not the only branch able to stand against the tremendous money power, the combined national wealth and aggregated capital of this country, which comes here and orders that this or that measure shall pass, subordinating to their own interests the rights and interests of the great masses of the people? Do you not know that the House stands here day after day as the only power and the only protection that the people have against the encroachments of giant corporations and the inordinate greed of the moneyed interests? Will any gentleman upon this floor question it? Why is it so? Because every two years every Representative upon this floor may be changed by the vote of the people. Every two years the whole personnel of this House changes, and the country has the right to send back men who will not forfeit their trust. When the great controversy that must sooner or later, ay, has already, come between the capitalists and the people, they have a right to see to it that their rights shall be guarded and maintained by men who, directly responsible to them, live among them in small districts, giving opportunity for a scrutiny into their public and private life.

It seems that public policy demands that there shall be a large number of Representatives unapproachable and incorruptible who cannot be moved by corporate greed to impose unfair and unjust burdens upon the people.

We have seen, Mr. Speaker, time and again in the history of the world instances wherein men have undertaken to overthrow the will of the people, and every time they have undertaken to do it it has been through the means of small legislative bodies. Look at the history of the French Empire. It was the House of Ancients that was subject to the will of Bonaparte, and not the House of Deputies. The House of Deputies with its five hundred members stood out against his will until his armed grenadiers with their bayonets entered the chamber and thrust them out bodily through the windows and doors. They were willing to withstand his great power and his demands; but it was the Ancients that yielded, and Bonaparte recollected that when he established his consular government by cutting down the number of the chamber until he made them subordinate to his will and deprived them of the essential power that they had possessed. He made them small and hewed them down to his own purposes. The history of England shows that a large Parliament withstood the power, nay, demanded and obtained the execution of Charles I, but the Rump Parliament, of one hundred members, yielded to Cromwell, who demanded it of them. Are we now, Mr. Speaker, the House being the only representative body, directly responsible to the people, to yield to an attempt which is to be made to cut down its number and power, or shall we respond to the expectations of the people by increasing the number of their Representatives by adding the small number contemplated by the bill? Eighteen new members to help represent them fairly and protect their interests upon the floor of this House is certainly not extraordinary.

Coming as the gentleman from New York does from a State where they feel the combined effect of vast capital and corporate greed, where financial power seeks to and does dominate the will of the people, his position is not surprising. Perhaps he would like to bring us within that power, which sooner or later will demand control of this Government. The question then presented will be, How are we to meet this demand? There is but one practical way: increase the representation, give the growing South and West their increased power, then let united interests combine them into opposition to the demands of capital and corporations, which antagonize equally the agriculturists of both sections.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one other objection has been urged by the gentleman from New York against this measure. He says he will not vote now for any apportionment bill. And why not? He will not vote for this apportionment bill at the present session, because he says the apportionment is not based upon population, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] asserts. He says it should be based upon suffrage, upon the number of voters, and not upon population. The gentleman is not warranted by the fourteenth amendment in making that assertion. The fourteenth amendment leaves the apportionment based upon population, except in those States which violate the provisions and clauses of that amendment.

He read from the decision of the Supreme Court that only where the States themselves, by a legislative enactment, interfere with the right of all resident males to vote, and pass unjust laws prohibitory thereof—only in that case could Congress interfere. But I understood from the last remarks the gentleman made that, under the lead of the plumed knight of Maine, he broke away from the decision of his own supreme court, which he read for our enlightenment, and that he wanted a congressional committee appointed to go into all of the Southern States and find out whether by fraud, by bulldozing, or by kukluxing, anybody was deprived of the right of suffrage.

Why all this cry about negroes not voting? Why all this pretense that they are bulldozed? Why this effort to take from the South the increased power which her enfranchized slaves have given her? Is this the object of your demand for investigation? Are you disappointed in your calculations? Did you expect the negroes to ever and forever vote the republican ticket against their own interests? Are you stricken with remorse, and do you regret your hasty action? The republican party, seeing the negroes vote against it, like Manfred in the Jungfrau, filled with remorse and regret, seem ready to exclaim:

> The spirits I have raised abandon me—
> The spells which I have studied baffle me—
> The remedy I reck'd of tortured me;
> * * * * * *
> For I have ceased
> To justify my deeds unto myself—
> The last infirmity of evil.

But to recur. Does the gentleman mean to insinuate or say that under the decision of the Supreme Court which he has read we have the right to reduce representation for any individual matters of that kind? And are we to wait until we send out a congressional committee under the fourteenth amendment to investigate all the States of the Union which have in their constitutions or statutes provisions and clauses inconsistent with that fourteenth amendment? Are we to wait until we send out such a committee to ascertain the constitutions of the States and make a report on which we can rationally act, and act with exactness? Are we to proceed to do that? I refer to a report of the committee made on the ninth census, in 1869–'70, by the President-elect, Mr. Garfield, then a Representative from Ohio, presented the matter to the House. Nothing was done except to pass section 6 of the act of 1872. What are the provisions in the constitutions and the statutes of the different States? I only call attention to them for a moment to show the utter impossibility of ever undertaking by investigation, by the census or in any other way, to ascertain the exact number of people who under this provision are excluded from the right to vote who have that right according to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I will take the State of Pennsylvania, to which the gentleman referred. What is the provision of the law of Pennsylvania? It is that those over twenty-two years of age who have paid the poll-tax assessed on them ten days before the election shall be entitled to vote. I quote from memory.

Now, I ask you if all the congressional committees that were ever appointed could go into the State of Pennsylvania and ascertain, from one end of it to the other, how many individuals come within the reach of that clause? Do they not change as often as an election comes round? Are they not so many this year and so many next year? If a man who did not pay last year pays his tax this year, he is not excluded. Next year he may be. It is as changeable as the sand on the sea-shore.

How are you to ascertain these matters? And is a gentleman warranted in asserting that he is not to vote for an apportionment bill until this thing becomes an absolute, fixed fact and certainty? Are we to stand here and deny to the great and growing West and South; are we going to deny to Texas and Kansas their increased representation in this House until a congressional committee goes out over Pennsylvania and finds how many people over twenty-two years of age have failed to pay their tax assessed ten days before election? And suppose we find out the number this year, will it not change the next; and we will require to have a different basis for the election of all the Congressmen in this House, and yet will know as little about it as we do now? Take Massachusetts and her illiteracy clause, which, it is said, excludes many of the population from voting, which under the fourteenth amendment ought to affect her representation in proportion; are we to appoint a congressional committee to open schools in Massachusetts and examine voters as to whether they can read? What power have we to examine a voter in this way? May he not learn to read in a month, and thus remove the disqualification? Yet all this and others ten thousand times more ridiculous must be gone over before the tender conscience of some members will allow them to apportion representation.

This matter has undergone an investigation in this House. When the republican Congress in 1872 fixed the apportionment bill they had this same subject before them. It has already been provided for as far as a State can provide for it. If the gentleman will turn to the act of 1872, he will find this provision:

> SEC. 6. That should any State, after the passage of this act, deny or abridge the right of any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years and citizens of the United States, to vote at any election named in the amendments to the Constitution, article 14, section 2, except for participation in the rebellion or other crime, the number of Representatives apportioned in this act to such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall have to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

So, Mr. Speaker, congressional action is unnecessary to accomplish this purpose. We already have upon the statute-book all that this House can do. We have passed an act to cut down the representation of each State in proportion as it disfranchises citizens contrary to the clause of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. Now, it is impracticable and impossible that this can be executed. There stands the law. In the face of it stands the impossibility, the utter and sheer impossibility and worse than nonsense, of any attempt to execute it. When the fourteenth amendment was passed no man dreamed of the consequences of it. When it was passed no word was ever said in regard to any subject save the right of the colored population, then being enfranchised, to vote. It was not expected that every State of this Union would be struck by it. It was not expected that every State of this Union would have a clause in its constitution in conflict with the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution.

It was not expected that all this trouble would arise out of it. We stand here to-day with that amendment before us, and with an absolute utter impossibility of ever enforcing it by any practical legislation or in any practical way. So, in 1872 the whole thing was abandoned by a republican Congress simply passing a law. They undertook to institute and carry out some things which the gentleman now asks for. I hold in my hand a table prepared by the Census Committee at that time, and which was presented to the House for its action on that very subject. It was pronounced so inefficient, so far from being just and correct, that it was totally abandoned by the republicans themselves at that time.

How many people under the fourteenth amendment were disqualified in 1870? In all the States of the Union, adding them all together, the total was 40,380. Where did these disfranchised people live? Were they in the sixteen States to which the gentleman refers? Were they located in the South? Are we to invoke the shades of slavery now to prevent an apportionment and a fair representation of the people? I ask what were the States in which lived the 40,380 persons who were prevented from voting at elections by State regulations contrary to the fourteenth amendment? Upon examination it will be found that a large portion of them lived in the Northern States. Every State of this Union had something like the same number except the State of Missouri, which reported 9,000. I suppose that was more from the fact that she made a correct and honest report rather than that she excluded more people from voting than did any other State.

The gentleman talks about the State of Rhode Island. How many were excluded from voting in the little State of Rhode Island? Nearly 3,000; the exact number was 2,825. And the gentleman has read there a long list to show that in the South there were fewer votes polled in the last presidential election than were polled in 1876. Is that a fair showing of the voters for the two years? Does not the gentleman well know that in 1876 the democratic party at that time was in power and marching forward as they believed to a result which they had long had near at heart, and expected to attain that result under the lead of the great statesman of New York? Every democrat in the Southern States rallied to the polls. I will not say that it was in the hope of getting an office; but still they went to the polls and every one of them voted, because they believed that Tilden would be elected, (as he was.) How was it in 1880? They expected to be beaten, and if a few votes fell off it was no more than might have been looked for. In 1876 Tilden carried the State of Kentucky by about 70,000 majority. In 1880, under the depressing influence of the Indiana election, we scarcely squeezed up to 45,000 majority. That is the way it went.

Talk about the Southern States falling off. Take the State of Rhode Island again; look at its vote in the last election. The two gentlemen who now expect to represent the State of Rhode Island in the Forty-seventh Congress received both together only 10,315 votes, unless the gentleman in the Library, who furnished me information from the Congressional Directory, has made some mistake about it. How many voters in Rhode Island failed to vote? It is fair to presume that there are 50,000 voters in that State from her population, and but 10,000 votes were cast, and the balance, 40,000, failed to register and to vote, four-fifths remaining away. Yet gentlemen raise their hands in holy horror because in the State of Virginia 24,000 less votes were polled in 1880 than in 1876.

Now, it is a well-known fact, if we are to consider this matter from a party stand-point, that the leaders of the republican party met and made a solemn resolve that they would not make any fight in the South, because they did not want to show a large number of votes there, but preferred to go to the country and say that they had been bulldozed from voting, as the gentleman now cries out.

That, I think, practically disposes of all the objections which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWLEY] has raised against the bill reported by the majority of the Select Committee on the Census.

A few words in support of that bill and that will conclude what little I have to say on the subject. I am aware that in framing any apportionment bill, if we group the States arbitrarily, it is impossible to so frame the bill that some unfairness shall not be presented by it. I am aware that there can be no apportionment of Representatives by which some State will not receive an advantage and gentlemen from another State not rise and say that their State has been unfairly treated, that its fraction is within a few thousand of the fraction of the other State that has been allowed a fractional Representative and they are not so allowed.

I know it is utterly impossible to frame any bill and present it to this House in which, if I may be allowed to arbitrarily group the States together, whether northern or southern, I cannot show an unfair distribution growing out of fractions. I will take the number presented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SHERWIN] in his address to the House. He says that three hundred and nineteen is a perfectly fair number. He groups the States, I believe, into what he terms the sixteen Southern States and the twenty-two Northern States. This is purely arbitrary.

Now there is no reason why he should so group them; there exists no reason in this country for such grouping. The Constitution contains nothing about the North or about the South. We do not under the Constitution apportion Representatives to the North and to the South, to the East and to the West; but we apportion them to the States of this Union according to their population. He has no right to group these sixteen States in one class, and those twenty-two in the other, count them up, and say "These have received more than their share, and the others have not received as many." Let me point him to a little calculation which he can make to see whether his apportionment is fair. I want him to take the States which I will name, group them together, divide their population by the ratio, and then take the other States and divide their population by the ratio; and I will show him that his is the most unfair presentation of the case that has been submitted to this House. Take the States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, California, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Nebraska, Ohio, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia, having in the aggregate a population of 29,653,785. Divide this population by 154,764, and you find that those States should have one hundred and ninety-one Representatives. But under the gentleman's bill, taking the tables furnished by the Census Office, those States get one hundred and ninety-six Representatives, five more than they are entitled to on an even division of their population; and in proportion as they gain unfairly other States must lose. The other States lose five, making a difference of ten in favor of these above named. I have as much right to group the States in my way as he has to group them in his. The result depends altogether upon the manner in which you group them. I will take all the States that get fractional representation, and under any number that can be selected I will group them in such a way as to make a difference of from eight to ten in favor of those States getting the fractions and against the others that do not.

The gentleman has no right to fix upon an imaginary line, call one the Southern, the other Northern States, and say that the number three hundred and eleven is unfair because with that number most of the fractional votes happen to fall on a particular side of that line.

If this is a question as to political parties, ought not the States to be grouped so that those voting the democratic ticket, or apparently doing so, shall be in one class and those voting the republican ticket in the other? Now take the States voting the democratic ticket in the last election. Take the sixteen Southern States and add California, (supposed to be a democratic State,) Indiana, and Connecticut. Add together the population of these States and divide the result by 158,745, the ratio of three hundred and eleven. Then take the other States, add their population together, divide the aggregate by 158,745, the ratio of three hundred and eleven, and you have a perfectly fair and even distribution of political power as between the two parties. Now, if questions of the effect on political parties is to be considered, what better or fairer result can you expect or do you desire? So far as parties are concerned the fixing of three hundred and eleven as the number of districts operates evenly and fairly between the democratic and republican parties. Now, why not select three hundred and eleven and stand by the bill which the committee has presented? Why should we go back upon the action of a committee who have considered this question so long?

Take the bill of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] which fixes the number at three hundred and one. Why should you adopt that number? Why arbitrarily stop there? Does it make a fair distribution? Apply even the rule of the gentleman from Illinois, granting sixteen States on one side and twenty-two States on the other, and you will find that these twenty-two States under an even division with a fraction of thirty thousand get a Representative belonging to the other group, because the Southern States have a fraction of one hundred and thirty-four thousand; and they do not get the odd member, while the other States with a fraction of thirty thousand do. If we are to do this thing fairly, I ask you whether that is fair among sections? If we are to consider sections as sections at all, three hundred and seven reaches the same result as three hundred and one, and is subject to the same criticism.

Now, upon a full consideration we have adopted three hundred and eleven; because it is as fair as any other number that can be fixed. You cannot reach absolute fairness in this matter; it never has been attained though it has been undertaken ever since the Constitution was adopted. First, there was the adoption of a ratio, regardless of the number of members which it would produce; and afterward the moiety system was ingrafted into the law, giving an additional member to each State having a fraction greater than one-half. This was found to operate harshly, as was supposed, in the case of some States; and it was scarcely ever strictly adhered to. The fairest system ever adopted was that of 1850, which has been adopted by this committee; that is, to fix what shall be the number of the House and then divide the aggregate population of all the States by that number in order to obtain a ratio; throwing off any fraction of a unit that may be presented; and then after giving each State so many Representatives upon an even division of its population by the ratio obtained to distribute the remaining member among those States having the largest fractions, regardless where they fall. If that is not perfectly fair, what rule can be fair? I know it has not been adhered to all the time. The republicans seem to have mixed this and the moiety system. In 1862, and probably also in 1872, the wholesome rule which I have just indicated was disregarded and the moiety system was partly followed. But even that did not suit the party in power. Arbitrarily and without cause they assigned to certain States numbers to which they were not entitled by any rule which could be discovered.

In 1872 two hundred and eighty was first fixed as the number the House was to have, and I think the ratio, if I recollect rightly, was adopted in regard to that number. Afterward it was increased to two hundred and eighty-three. They then added eight more to it, arbitrarily, by assigning them to various States, and on that they gave them two more, and finally a State was admitted, making the two hundred and ninety-three members we now have.

Are we to go by arbitrary assignment in this matter or shall we adopt some uniform and permanent rule and march up to the number, regardless of where the fraction falls? That is all we have done in this case. That is what the committee recommend.

Why did the committee adopt three hundred and eleven? I will tell you why. It affects fewer of the States in regard to their representation than any other reasonable number that could be reached. We had regard for the expressed will of a great many members of the House that the number should not be increased very largely. We looked over the floor of the House and we concluded that eighteen additional members could be seated in this Hall without its undergoing any great or permanent change, at least we believe they can.

We found there was a willingness on the part, as we believed, of members of the House to go as far as an increase of eighteen members and a great unwillingness to go beyond that. We found when we got to three hundred and eleven, every State in this Union preserved intact its representation or increased, except four, that is the States of Maine, Vermont, Connecticut, New York, and we could not reach those States without increasing the number of the House beyond what we believed we would be sustained in doing.

Therefore, when we got to that the most practicable point we could stop at, we did stop. Indiana under that gets a Representative and maintains its position just as it does now. She came and she begged and insisted, as a State always does, that she should be considered. Massachusetts will go to three hundred and three, because she remains intact. Pennsylvania says "I want to go to three hundred and seven," because there she remains as she is. Now should we stop at three hundred and seven, and leave Indiana out when by going there she can be reached?

I do not look at this from any partisan standpoint, and I hope I do not from any party or political point of view. My own State will increase one Representative if we go to three hundred and fourteen. I do not ask this House to increase the power of that State by going to three hundred and fourteen—to make the small increase of three more—to reach it. I am willing to stand here on the committee's bill, three hundred and eleven, because I believe it a particularly fair bill to every State in this Union and to every party.

As I said awhile ago, we may look over the fractional representation and see who is it that gets this increased power growing out of it. Why, sir, Southern States and the great and growing West. You cannot expect New England and the East not to lose their representation and power because "westward the star of empire has taken its way." These Western and Southern States, growing as they do, and, as they have, increasing year by year in population and in power and strength, it is to them the fractional votes should be assigned. Why should New England have a fractional vote when two years from now, if we had another apportionment, she could not possibly reach it? She is going down and declining, while the West is growing up; and if the West had a fractional vote to-day to which she was not entitled, two years from now, if a new apportionment was made, many of the Western States would be entitled not only to one fractional vote, but to two or three others. One State in the West has increased in population 367 per cent. Are we not to respond to that State with an increased representation? Texas has increased from six to ten members—an empire within itself—and, growing at that rate, five years from now, if we could have a new apportionment, she would be entitled to five more. Shall we hesitate about giving her a fractional Representative when, before he gets his seat, she will be entitled to four or five?

Now, New England and the Eastern States have their fair representation. They have not only population collected from other portions of the country, not only emigrants who halt there on their way west, not only those who gather there in the season of pleasure to their springs and other places of resort, but those whom business carries in that direction, making many thousands counted for them who do not belong to their population, but are merely migratory and belong to the West or will in a little time. They have already the power they ought to have. The great South and West, united in every interest, finding, as you do, the largest number of fractional Representatives go to those sections, is it not just and fair their increase in population should have it? If we are to invoke personal interest, is it more than is to be expected that these two great sections, united by common ties, agriculturists as they are, furnishing the food and largely the raiment to nearly the whole world, united in every interest, corporate ridden by the mighty corporations of the East and overwhelmed as they are by unjust and iniquitous taxation in their interest, you will find the great and growing West and South will stand together claiming the advantages they have under the bill to strengthen their power in the common fight against the tariff, the most unjust and oppressive the world has ever known, and the railroads which rob them of hundreds of millions of dollars upon their agricultural products every year. I say, standing together on all the great questions of taxation and together in all the great fights we are sooner or later to make on the corporations of this country now undertaking to control and dominate us, is it more than fair these two sections should claim at least what is just and fair to them in the way of representation in this House by fractions or otherwise?

I trust, Mr. Speaker, when this House comes to consider the bill presented to it by the committee that at least upon this side of the House it will receive calm, patient, and careful consideration with a view to the distribution of the political power among the States in accordance with their rights. The South too long has been deprived of its representation by the unjust and inaccurate census of 1870. She was deprived of a fair representation upon this floor, the representation to which she was entitled. And while I do not believe that her population has increased in the marvelous degree the census shows, for the reason that I am convinced, as I believe is the judgment of the country, that the census of 1870 was unfair; still, in consequence of the fact that for the last ten years she has been deprived of her fair share of representation, we give it to her now under the terms of this bill. Under the present census South Carolina, thrice gone over because of the claim of partisan press and of party spirit, to show that there was not a fair count of the population of that State; I say that State, deprived of its fair share of representation, should now have it under the terms of this bill. If any advantage is to follow, it should fall to those States that so long have been deprived of their rights.

Now, I think this is a fair bill, I think it is a fair presentation of an old subject, and I do hope that at all events the democratic side of this House will agree to the bill reported from the committee. [Here the hammer fell.] I append, with leave of the House, a few tables giving the result of some calculations which I have made, and some statistics which may be of advantage to the members, (A, B, C.)

Mr. HUNTON. I move to extend the time of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Virginia, but I had just concluded, and desired, if I had any time remaining, to yield it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Mr. WHITE.]

Mr. LORING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

Mr. KEIFER. I do not desire to take up the time of the House but a few minutes in the consideration of this question, especially at this time, and therefore I will yield whatever time the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] may desire out of the time allowed to me.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Speaker, there is a provision of the Constitution found in article 14, section 2, which says that—

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State.

It further provides that—

> When the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that lawyers construe this provision to mean that such "denial or abridgment" must be by some legal enactment. While this may be good law, I submit that the spirit of the Constitution may be violated while the letter remains unbroken. I insist that whenever one portion of the citizens of any State by a systematic plan so bring it about that a large number of her citizens are kept from the polls, that the violation of this provision is as complete as if a law was duly enacted which simply produced the same effect, and that such citizens should be deducted in making any fair calculation upon which to base an apportionment bill, or at least that such lack of votes in any given State should be taken into account in any fair apportionment bill.

Hence it is that I claim that an apportionment bill founded upon the last vote of people of the United States would really meet the requirements of the Constitution in spirit much more perfectly than one founded on the last census, because upon that basis we would eliminate from representation those citizens whose right to the ballot has been abridged. You must remember that the election last fall was a general one, one in which all the people were equally interested without regard to latitude or sectional lines; that the canvass was spirited and determined in all parts of the country alike, so that the inference is fair that the great bulk of voters whose rights were not in some way denied or abridged went to the polls and cast their ballots. Therefore I affirm that the votes of that election are a better index of the people who should be taken into account in this apportionment than is the census just completed.

In view of this conviction I have carefully prepared a table showing the vote of each State, the present number of members from each State, the number that would be here from each State, using the average number of votes cast for a Congressman as the basis of calculation; also the number which the bill of the committee proposes to give to each State, and then the number each State would have if the committee had used the vote for the basis of their calculation instead of the census. I have also added a column showing the average number of votes cast in each State for one Congressman in the next Congress. Also another column, showing what the average vote would have been for each Congressman in each State had the number elected been the same as is now proposed by the bill of the committee—that is, 311. This table I ask leave to print in the RECORD, and so will not detain the House to read it now.

It is perhaps proper for me to state that these computations have all been made by myself, and while they may not be absolutely accurate, I do not believe there are any material errors. Unfortunately for me, I did not have the Census Bureau at my command to aid me in these calculations. I desire now to state some of the most striking results that my examination of this subject has discovered.

The whole number of votes in the entire thirty-eight States at the last election was 9,297,592. Hence the average number of votes to each Congressman of the next House is 31,732, and the average number of votes to each Congressman, if you fix the number at 311, as does the bill of the committee, would be 29,896. Now, let us take, for example, the State of Mississippi. This bill gives her seven members, whereas upon the basis of her vote she would be entitled to only four. You can readily see this. Four times 29,896 gives 119,584, and the vote of Mississippi was only 117,078. Hence she would get the fourth member by a fraction, though a large one. On the basis of this bill she would get a Congressman for every 16,725 votes cast, which is just about one-half the number that it takes under the bill to elect a member, on an average, in the Northern States. Let me say right here, that it appears from actual calculation that the average number of votes for each Congressman in the Northern States, if the number were 311, is 33,838, while the average vote for each one in the Southern States is only 23,376, a difference of 10,462 votes.

For another example, let us take the State of Alabama. The bill of the committee gives her eight members, whereas upon the basis of her vote she is entitled to only five. Take the average number of votes again for a Congressman, 29,896; five times that is 149,480. The entire vote of Alabama was 151,507. So that after giving her the five members, there is only left a small fraction of 2,027. This State by the number fixed by this bill would get a Congressman for every 18,938 votes, which is fifteen thousand less than the average number of votes for a Northern Congressman, and 10,958 less than the average of the entire country.

Again, take the State of Arkansas. The bill gives her five members. She had a vote of 106,249. This would entitle her to three members, and leave a fraction of 16,561. Allow her a member for this fraction, and then she would have but four. The bill would give her a member for every 21,249 votes, which is 12,000 less than the average at the North, and 8,647 less than the general average.

Once more, take the State of Georgia, and here the disparity between the vote basis and the census is certainly glaring. The bill of the committee gives Georgia ten members, while upon the basis of her vote she would be entitled to only five. For, take the average vote, 29,896, and repeat it five times, and you have 149,480. Now, the entire vote of Georgia was 155,655. Take from it the 149,480, and you have left only the small fraction 6,175. The bill gives her a member for every 15,565 votes, which is 1,500 less than one-half the number required in the Northern States, and is 14,331 less than the general average.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HORR. Of course I will, for my next sentence was to be: "And does not such a state of facts call upon Georgia to rise and explain?" [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I desire simply to ask the gentleman a question. As I understand the gentleman, the logic of his remarks is that apportionment ought to be based upon the figures of the last election, and not upon numbers, as required by the Constitution. Conceding that that is the gentleman's view, and that is the only sense there is in it——

Mr. HORR. I am glad there is that much. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Conceding that is true, would it not be the better way for your party to succeed if they were not to try to vote at all in Georgia, and then you would greatly reduce the number of Representatives?

Mr. HORR. They have come so mighty near that already it does not make much odds now. How much of this thing does she expect the people of this country to endure and still hold their peace?

Then again there is Louisiana. This bill gives her six members. Her vote would entitle her to but three. Her entire vote was only 97,201. Three times the average, 29,896, gives us 89,688, which taken from her vote leaves a fraction of only 7,513, which is only about one-quarter of the average vote for a Congressman, and would not of course entitle her to another. The bill gives her a member for every 16,200 votes, which is not half the number required to elect a man in the North under the same bill, and is 13,690 less than the general average. But you say these States are exceptional. Not at all. Texas and Virginia are but little better. The bill gives Texas ten members. Her vote would entitle her to but eight, and it gives Virginia ten when her vote would entitle her to but seven.

Here we have seven States which the bill gives fifty-six members, and which, upon the basis of votes cast are entitled to but thirty-six members, showing a gain of twenty Congressmen who really have no voting people at their backs.

Let us take the eight States, Georgia, Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Virginia, Louisiana, Mississippi and Kentucky. The total vote of these eight States was 1,155,109. They have fifty-eight members in the next House. That gives an average of 19,917 votes to each member.

Now take these eight States: Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. Their total vote was 4,564,226, and they have one hundred and thirty-six members, which gives an average of 33,643 votes to each member. Thus you see it takes 13,643 more votes to send a man to Congress from these eight Northern States than it does to send one from those eight Southern States. But it may be claimed that I have selected States so as to bring about this result. Let us see about that. The entire vote of the sixteen Southern States was 2,758,449. There are from those States one hundred and six members. This would give for each Congressman-elect from those States an average vote of 26,023, but if the number were one hundred and eighteen, as fixed by the bill of the committee, it would take only 23,376 votes for each member.

The entire vote of the twenty-two Northern States was 6,539,143. There are from those States one hundred and eighty-seven members, which would give for each Congressman-elect 34,968 votes; and had the number elected been one hundred and ninety-three, as provided by this bill, then the average vote to each member would have been 33,833; which shows that it took 8,945 more votes to elect a member of the next House in the Northern States than it did in the Southern States; and if the number of members had have been the same as is fixed by this bill of the committee, the discrepancy would be swelled to 10,462 votes.

If you should give the Northern States a member for every 23,376 votes cast at the last election, and that is the number it would have taken on the average for each member from the South had the number of members been as fixed by this bill, she would have in the next House two hundred and eighty members! And if you should give the South only a member for each 33,838 votes, and that is the average vote in the North with the number fixed as by the bill, she would have only eighty members in the next House. The mere statement of these facts shows that there is something wrong somewhere.

Mr. ACKLEN. I would like to ask the gentleman to permit me to ask him one question in reference to the comparison that he has made of the districts of the South, particularly in the State of Louisiana. I ask him if the answer to the suggestions he has made is not this: that there is practically no contest in most of the districts in the South? I know that it is particularly the case in the State of Louisiana. In the third district, which I have the honor to represent, there was, however, a very sharp contest at the last election, and the vote was about twenty-five thousand; whereas in the sixth district of that State the entire vote was only about fifteen thousand, and in some of the other districts it was, I believe, a little less. Is not the answer to his statements the one I suggest?

Mr. HORR. I wish to say to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] that I first looked up this matter on the basis of taking individual districts of the South, but the figures were so severe on the South that I had not the pluck to present them to the House. [Laughter.] So I took the general average, because it is milder; does not appear so savage.

Mr. ACKLEN. Allow me to say——

Mr. HORR. I would have to ask another question of you, which would lead to a long debate. It would be the question, why there is no contest in the districts of the South?

Mr. ACKLEN. I am satisfied that the gentleman is aware that in some of the northern districts there is practically no contest.

Mr. HORR. Before I get through I will give you ample credit for this trouble up north.

Mr. McMILLIN. Has the gentleman included the State of Rhode Island in his calculations?

Mr. HORR. I think that before I get through Little Rhody will be taken care of. [Laughter.]

But this basis for an apportionment bill cuts both ways. Take the State of New York. The bill of the committee gives her thirty-two members, but when you take the vote for the basis of your calculations she would be entitled to thirty-seven. The committee's bill gives her a member for each 34,521 votes, which is 4,625 votes more than the general average on each member, and which on her thirty-two members amounts to 148,000 votes, thus compelling her to throw away almost as many votes as the State of Alabama casts.

Do you know if you should give the State of New York a member for the same number of votes that sends one here from Georgia to the next House that she would have on this floor in that Congress seventy-one members, and she would not have to have a little fractional member either, as she is compelled to under the bill of the committee. With such a membership she might indeed be called the Empire State. And if Georgia had only a member for each number of votes that sends one from New York she would have only four, in place of the ten given her by the bill. Can the gentleman in charge of this bill, [Mr. COX,] can any one, give any good reason why the State of Georgia should have a member here representing only 15,565 voters while the great State of New York requires 34,521 votes to each of her members?

Again, take the State of Ohio. The bill gives her twenty members, while on the voting basis she would be entitled to twenty-four. It takes under this bill of the committee 36,248 votes for a member of Congress from Ohio. That is 6,352 in excess of the general average. On her twenty members it would amount to 127,040 votes, which is 29,839 more votes than the State of Louisiana cast, and it takes in Ohio 20,048 more votes to get a man to the next Congress than it does for this same State of Louisiana. Only think of it: if Ohio had a member for every same number that sends one from Louisiana she would be represented in the next House by forty-five members—a sufficient number, it seems to me, to satisfy even the modest claims of her timid, unobtrusive statesmen. Does any one claim, can any one claim that such a disparity as this can be explained on any theory of fair dealing?

But, again, let us take the State of Indiana. She cast at the last election 470,678 votes. The bill under consideration gives her thirteen members. On the vote basis she would be entitled to sixteen. The bill of the committee makes it take in this State 36,206 votes to elect a member of the next House. That is 6,310 more than the general average, which on her thirteen members amounts to 82,030 votes, about two-thirds as many votes as the entire State of Mississippi cast. In other words, it takes 19,481 more votes to elect a Congressman in Indiana than it does in the State of Mississippi. To continue my former comparison, if the same number of votes cast for a Congressman in Mississippi would send one from Indiana there would be twenty-eight Hoosiers on the floor of the next House instead of thirteen; and should Mississippi be allowed a member for only the same number that sends one from Indiana her seven members would dwindle down to three. And yet a bill which produces these astounding results the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] would have us think is the "very pink of perfection."

We are told that "comparisons are odious." One would think so. But let me say that the only exception to this state of affairs in the entire North is the State of Rhode Island and in a slight degree perhaps the State of Massachusetts. The vote of Rhode Island looks bad. The census basis gives her two members while she votes enough for only one, and even that one is on a fraction. I am sorry for this, for if there is a gamy State in the Union it is Little Rhody. Her wealth, her common schools, her great industries, her distinguished statesmen, her entire history from Roger Williams down to the present time, need cause none of her sons to blush. Yet I am compelled to say that there is something wrong in her voting arrangements. She needs overhauling somewhere. Her vote leads me to believe she ought to be contented with one Congressman, and I think her statesmen upon reflection will see it.

Massachusetts by the voting basis also loses one member. This bill gives her eleven; her vote shows her entitled to but ten; and I am clearly of the opinion that ten does her ample justice.

Is it not singular that in the entire twenty-two Northern States, if you fix the number at three hundred and eleven and calculate upon the basis of votes, Rhode Island and Massachusetts are the only two that would lose a member; six of them, to wit, Vermont, Oregon, Nevada, Nebraska, Maine, and Minnesota, would neither gain nor lose, and the remaining fourteen Northern States would all gain, while in the South not a single State gains on the vote basis. Florida, Delaware, West Virginia, Maryland, and South Carolina neither gain nor lose, and the remaining eleven all lose. So that whereas the bill gives the Southern States one hundred and eighteen members, and the Northern States one hundred and ninety-three, on the basis of votes cast the Southern States are entitled to only ninety-three members, and the Northern States should get two hundred and eighteen. That is a difference of fifty members in favor of the South and against the North; and yet with all these facts staring them in the face the committee go to work deliberately and fix upon a number that will give the South more proportionate strength than she now has by six members, and then claim that this is a fair, impartial bill. And the number selected by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] gives the same section an advantage of four.

I am aware that under the strict letter of the Constitution the census basis is the proper one. But let me say to gentlemen here that there is a deep feeling in the minds of the people of this country that this systematic crushing out of nearly one-third of the entire vote in so many States of this Union is little less than a terrible crime, and the people fear that if not prevented it will destroy the very foundations of civil liberty in this country. If we cannot have a free, untrameled ballot, then there is little need of apportionment bills of any kind, for without that the will of the people cannot be expressed and all elections become a mere farce.

Now, I am not going to say whether the recent census is a fair one or not. There are many of the returns that cannot be explained upon what was supposed to be reliable history of the events of the past ten years in some of the States. But what I do maintain is, that no man can reconcile the census returns with the votes cast on any basis of fair dealing. It seems to be beyond the power of contradiction that there was gross cheating either in the census or in the voting. Then I ask does it not follow that to have a fair apportionment both of these elements should be taken into account?

For one I am satisfied that the present number of members in this House is large enough, if not too large, for the good of the country. It is now as unwieldy a body as the heart of man can well wish. If there is any number that would render it more difficult to do any needed work than the one we are now laboring under, and any one knows what that number is, in all conscience, I hope he will keep it to himself, for should our leaders here get hold of it I should well-nigh despair of all legislation in the future.

However, if we are to increase the present number at all, then such a number should be selected as will leave the relative strength of the two sections just as it now is; in any event no number should be taken which will add strength to that portion of the country which now has so much more than she is really entitled to, as I have already shown.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman has given us a long mathematical disquisition upon the disparity between the votes cast North and South, and he has delivered to us a lecture upon the small votes on which some men represent constituencies here. Now, on looking at the Directory, I see that there were 18,071 votes polled against the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] and only 11,993 for him. Why did not this conscientious qualm strike the gentleman earlier, if he is in favor of the majority ruling in the different districts?

Mr. HORR. Which vote is it the gentleman is figuring from?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I figure from the vote upon which the gentleman now occupies his seat here and speaks.

Mr. HORR. There was a large majority against me in my district on that vote, if you add together the greenback and democratic votes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HORR. The greenback craze, which is similar to the one the gentleman has, although he is a democrat, [laughter,] ran through my district; and the majority against me, taking the democratic and the greenback vote, was, as I remember, about 8,500. But if the gentleman will look at the returns of the last election in my district, he will see that the people came to their senses on that subject.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But the point is this: How is it that the gentleman, with the views he has uttered here, is willing to represent his constituency on so small a minority—so small a vote?

Mr. HORR. Why, sir, I represent my whole district. Our State elects on pluralities.

Mr. MCMILLIN. So, I would answer the gentleman from Michigan, under the Constitution we must fix the basis of our future representation upon the population, and not upon the votes cast.

Mr. HORR. All I claim is, that the vote should be taken into account; and I am trying to show that this proposition of the committee fixing three hundred and eleven, the only number which gives the South six more members than they now have, is an outrage in view of the fact that they already have a good deal more representation than their votes show they ought to have.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And in defense of the committee, I ask the gentleman whether it is not the fact that there are numbers smaller than three hundred and eleven which will give the South a greater proportional representation?

Mr. HORR. No, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. There is such a number.

Mr. HORR. Then, I do not know it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will say there is a smaller number which will do it, and the committee is not subject to that animadversion.

Mr. HORR. My memory is different; that is all.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The statistics show it.

Mr. HORR. I was stating, Mr. Chairman, that a bill on the basis of three hundred and nineteen would wrong no one and could be passed here in a day. The number proposed by the minority of the committee, three hundred and nineteen, does that very thing, and leaves a large number of the States with exactly their present number of members, or gives them an increase, and leaves only Maine, Vermont, and New Hampshire to suffer a loss of one each.

If you go above the present number at all, why not fix upon some number that will thus be free from all charge of partisanship, and which will or should give perfect satisfaction to all sections of the country. I believe it best that a fair and just apportionment bill should be passed by us at this session of Congress. So many State Legislatures are in session that such a measure at this time seems advisable. It is perhaps impossible to have a non-partisan measure of any kind proposed by the majority here. If so, we may be compelled to choose between this unjust and unfair measure of the committee and no bill at all. I dislike such an alternative, but this question is of such grave import to the whole nation that I am satisfied that rather than have this bill become the law we would better refer the whole matter to a new Congress, composed of men just fresh from the people, men who were elected in a contest when all these questions were discussed and fully investigated, and who will come here knowing the wishes of the people on this important subject. Believing as I do that this bill was drawn with the simple purpose of giving more strength to that section whose people are guilty of the great wrongs against the ballot which I have pointed out, for one I am fully determined to oppose the measure, first, last, and all the time, and that, too, with all the means that a kind Providence and parliamentary law will permit. [Laughter.]

In conclusion, let me say that I have given the foregoing figures with no desire of censure or abuse toward any portion of our fair land. If any of these statements seem harsh it is simply because some sections of the country so conduct their elections that to recite the multiplication table even within their borders would seem abusive. If I know the earnest desire of my own heart it is that such a bill may be finally passed as will show that we are all actuated by a lively sense of fair dealing, and that each member here may be able to say that in this one matter I rose above all party considerations and was actuated and inspired only by the exalting sentiment of "charity toward all and malice toward none."

Mr. KEIFER. I yield now for five minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BRIGGS.]

Mr. MCLANE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. KEIFER. I have but very few minutes, but will yield for a short question.

Mr. MCLANE. I wish to develop an idea of the gentleman from Michigan a little more fully than he has. I understand him, although he has not said it in express terms, but the general spirit of his remarks leads me to the conclusion that he feels the Southern States have in some way or other deprived the negro of his suffrage.

Mr. HORR. I do not know who they are who do not vote. I do not know exactly the folks. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCLANE. And therefore they should lose representation. Now,

I want to know from the honorable gentleman from Michigan if that is the idea he wishes to convey?

Mr. HORR. My idea was simply this, that they ought to be deprived of a portion of their representation under that clause of the Constitution which I first quoted if they persist in keeping people away from the polls.

Mr. McLANE. People away from the polls!

Mr. HORR. My main object was to show the unfairness of a bill which fixes the number so as to give them this advantage with all these facts staring them in the face.

Mr. McLANE. I wish to say to the gentleman that he can hold his soul in patience as to that negro vote. If he supposes we, the white voters of the South, mean to deprive the negroes of their votes, I say he may hold his soul in patience. We accept in its full development the constitutional theory propounded by the gentleman from New York that the Constitution of the United States bases representation upon population, and our past experience has given us confidence in the result of universal suffrage. There is no occasion, therefore, for any honorable gentleman on this floor to suppose that the negroes of the South, whether they be voters or whether they be Representatives, will fall below the level of the white voter or the white Representative as he has been found in the States of the North.

Mr. HORR. Will you let me ask you a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HORR. Do you think negroes of the South have been permitted for the past six years to have a free and untrammeled ballot all over the South?

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Speaker, I have no idea that the people of the South—the negroes of the South—have had as free and as untrammeled a suffrage in the past as they will have in the future. But——

[Cries of "All right!" on the republican side.]

Mr. HORR. That is encouraging.

Mr. McLANE. But, Mr. Speaker, while I give that frank answer to the gentleman from Michigan, to his inquiry, he will not withhold from me his attention when I say that while the negroes have not had as untrammeled a suffrage in the past as they will have in the future——

Mr. HORR. That would lead to a long debate.

Mr. McLANE. It would not lead to a long debate. I simply want to make a brief reply in answer to the gentleman's question as to why the negroes of the South have not——

Mr. BRIGGS. I decline to yield the floor any further.

Mr. McLANE. I think I am entitled to the privilege of answering the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HORR. I say this would lead to a debate, because I have some facts myself in that connection which I would like to submit.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. McLANE. If the gentleman still declines to yield to enable me to complete my answer, then I will take the liberty of doing what has been done occasionally here, of publishing in the RECORD a full answer to the question of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose, in the brief time allotted to me, to discuss this question of a new apportionment of representation in Congress. I could hardly state my views in the brief period of five minutes; but during this discussion constant reference has been made to the State which I have the honor in part to represent. I notice by the speech of the gentleman from New York that, according to his statement, New Hampshire has a senate which consists of twelve, and that she has in the popular branch of her Legislature three hundred and seventy-nine members.

Now, Mr. Speaker, both of these statements are erroneous. The senate of the State of New Hampshire consists of twenty-four members. The house of representatives varies, sometimes one number and sometimes another. Under our constitution we endeavor to give every town in the State its representation in the lower house of the State Legislature, and every town which has a population of six hundred inhabitants is entitled to a representative upon that floor. If the town has not six hundred inhabitants and is so situated that it can be classed with another smaller town, making the aggregate population of both six hundred or over, we class the two towns together and give them a representative in common in the lower branch of the State Legislature. If the town has less than six hundred and is so situated that it cannot be classed with another, then we give that town a representative for such a proportion of the time as its population bears to the whole number required. Under that basis the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, in the popular branch, had every place elected, would have contained three hundred and one members, and the Legislature for 1880 would have contained three hundred and three. Now, under the last census, the census just taken, we shall reapportion our representation in the Legislature, and have a larger house than we have ever had before.

In the discussion here to-day it is assumed that a large house is unwieldy and that it cannot be controlled, and that business cannot be conducted or transacted as well as in a smaller one. Is that true? If it is, the fault lies at the door of every member of that house and nowhere else. We have a larger house in our State than this. We transact the business of that little State sometimes in four weeks, sometimes in six weeks, and hardly ever extend our legislative session beyond a period extending over eight weeks; and this talk, gentlemen, that you cannot manage and control a large house I have no faith in, for I believe the fact that this House is sometimes disorderly—I believe it and know it—and you know as well as I do that the fault lies right at your own doors and nowhere else. Another thing: they point to the Calendar of this House and talk about the mass of business that lies there untransacted. Who is to blame? It is the rules which you have enacted; the rules which you have established, which cripple every motion and thwart the efforts of all the members everywhere to consider the public business here. Reorganize your rules, let members of the House observe them, and the size of the House will be no objection then in the transaction of its business.

Now, there is another thing: I do not believe in reducing the size of the lower House of Representatives. This body is the body that represents directly the people of this nation. If you look over your country you will find railroad corporations extending their rails from ocean to ocean, grasping and absorbing their side lines, and growing in wealth and proportions, and exerting a terrible power and influence over the legislation not only of the House, but over that of the States themselves—a power that is being felt everywhere. The smaller you make your House the more easy do you make it for these vast corporations to control the interests and the legislation of this country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KEIFER. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE.]

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Ohio has yielded me two minutes, for which I am very much obliged, and in which I propose to make a brief explanation in justice to my State. At another time I shall avail myself of the opportunity to express my views on the proposition on this subject for which I intend to vote.

Pennsylvania, however, has been somewhat conspicuous in this discussion, and has been severely commented on for retaining what is known as the property qualification in the apportionment of members of the Legislature, and thus affecting the apportionment for members of Congress. Such is not the case. Pennsylvania has no mere property qualification for the voter, nor for the holding of office. At one time the property qualification existed in the constitution of Pennsylvania. Our ancestors, when they settled in Philadelphia, being freeholders themselves, determined that no one should be admitted to the privileges of the government unless he was himself a freeholder. He must possess a certain amount of land. This property qualification was a prerequisite to the privilege of suffrage. This qualification was then common to all or most of the States. But long since a more liberal spirit has obtained in Pennsylvania, and now there is no property qualification to the voter. Representation there is based entirely upon population. This change was made by our present constitution, framed in 1873. We have a tax-paying prerequisite, but this is not based upon property.

It is provided a tax shall be paid at least thirty days before the election, which shall have been assessed at least sixty days before the election. No amount of tax is required. The smallest amount of a county or State tax is sufficient. This is in the nature, indeed, of a poll-tax for the purpose of fixing the place of residence and to prevent fraud at our elections. And the man or the voter against whom the tax is assessed is not required to have any quantity of property whatever. It is assessed by the borough and ward and township assessors. These are the same officers who register the voters. This registry is a precaution against fraudulent voting. The tax—the inconsiderable tax required of the voter—is more of a registry proceeding than a property qualification. And I may say further, that this registration is not really a prerequisite; for if a man has the privilege under the constitution to vote otherwise he can prove it, notwithstanding his name may not be on the registry list. I make this brief statement in answer to the criticisms about the alleged property qualification in our Pennsylvania constitutions.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Chair allow me to make a suggestion? I understand all that remains of the hour of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is only about five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is seven minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand further that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] wishes to take the floor after the gentleman from Ohio, who is not ready to proceed to-night. I suggest under those circumstances that the House allow the gentleman from Ohio to go on this afternoon and occupy the time he needs, after which the gentleman from Mississippi may be recognized in his own right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. ROBINSON. My proposition is to let the gentleman from Ohio know in advance that he can have more than five minutes to discuss this question.

Mr. HOOKER. I have no objection whatever to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and agree to it with this modification, however, that, at the request of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE,] I desire to give him five minutes to reply to an inquiry of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HORR.]

Mr. KEIFER. I need only about twenty minutes altogether.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is requested that the gentleman from Ohio, who is entitled to seven minutes, may have his time extended thirteen minutes, so that he may occupy twenty minutes in all.

Mr. McLANE. When does the gentleman propose to take his twenty minutes?

Mr. KEIFER. Right now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman proposes to occupy the time till four o'clock; and after that the gentleman from Mississippi, who will be next recognized, proposes to yield a portion of his time to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE.]

Mr. COX. I desire to say, before my friend from Ohio proceeds, there will be no vote taken to-night. I will also ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he will not allow the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] to occupy his five minutes before he proceeds with his own remarks?

Mr. KEIFER. I have no objection whatever to that if such is the wish of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. McLANE. When I said to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] that I had no idea the negro vote in the South had been as untrammeled in the past as it would be in the future I was about to proceed to tell him why.

At the close of the war, and for ten years or for twelve years after the war, the South was held in subjection by the Army and the vote in the Southern States was under the protection of the Army; I might almost say under the direction of the Army. And the white and the black populations in the South were held in a relation of antagonism. There was no question as to the fact that the South was in a state if not of anarchy then of military subjection; and through the entire South the voting during that period was a forced and unnatural vote. The black man voted or the white man voted as the military forces permitted, or subject at least to the violent excitement which this unconstitutional supervision created.

And especially was it true of the black man that he only voted where the Army stood ready to protect him, not because the white man of the South assailed him, but because he had been made by force to consider himself the ward of the Federal Government; and not only was he made to vote under the protection of the bayonet, but the white man was taught to know that the colored man thus protected and inspired was to govern the State, and a condition of anarchy unparalleled in the history of the world existed through those States. And this same bayonet that protected the black man in his vote carried the black man into the hall of legislation and protected him in the hall of legislation when he was wrongfully legislating for the State. During that time there was no free vote in the South, whether of the white man or of the black man. That period ceased when the administration of General Grant ceased. The last vestige of that military despotism was in 1876. It was as recently as this present administration. When Rutherford B. Hayes was inaugurated President of the United States the Army still held the legislative halls of Louisiana. And from and after that day the black man of the South—and I say it to his credit—votes as freely as the white man of the South. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" on the republican side.]

Mr. HORR. How is it in Louisiana?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I say that is true in regard to Louisiana.

Mr. McLANE. And it is for the credit of Louisiana that the black man can vote as freely there as the white man can vote in Michigan.

Mr. HORR. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maryland one question.

Mr. McLANE. I say to the honorable gentleman from Michigan without disrespect, that if comparison be made between the Representatives sent to the floor of this House from Michigan and the Representatives sent by the negro vote of Louisiana it will not be in any sense to the disparagement of the latter.

Mr. HORR. Will you answer me this question? If your statement is true, why is it at the election in 1876 that the vote given has fallen off? Why is it that your vote in 1880 is less than it was four years ago at the presidential election?

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman from Michigan knows perfectly well that the vote is light where there is no contest, or where the result of the contest is certain, and this result obtains in the North as fully as in the South, and in 1880 there was little or no contest in Louisiana.

Mr. HORR. And why no contest?

Mr. MORRISON. Because the republicans abandoned the contest in the South and undertook to buy votes enough to answer their purpose in the North.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I will answer the gentleman's question why there was no contest.

Mr. McLANE. I do not want to be interrupted.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I want to answer the gentleman from Michigan; the gentleman from Maryland has not answered him. I want to answer his question truthfully.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] has expired and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROBERTSON. As the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] propounded a question to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] which he has not answered fully, I would like to answer it and answer it truthfully, as it applies to my State. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"] You do not want the truth. [Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] is not in order.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I only want a minute or two.

Mr. KEIFER. If it will not come out of my time I will yield to the gentleman, because the House has been very liberal to me.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The gentleman from Michigan asked the question why it was that the vote of Louisiana——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent for the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] to proceed?

A MEMBER. How long?

Mr. ROBERTSON. A few minutes.

Mr. REED. We desire unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] shall have time to reply.

Mr. ROBERTSON. That is right.

Mr. REED. If that is done, then as many of those gentlemen may talk as want to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there consent?

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] asked for a moment or two of time to make a statement, and appealed to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] to yield, which he did.

Mr. KEIFER. Not to come out of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] will recollect that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] yielded upon condition that it should not be taken out of his time, which condition it was not in the power of the Chair to grant. The House itself must give consent to that.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being called for, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] will proceed.

Mr. KEIFER. In the midst of this wild confusion I can hardly expect to speak calmly and moderately, as I always try to do, and yet entertain the distinguished gentlemen here.

I shall vote for three hundred and nineteen members in this House for the coming decennial period. Having announced that, I want to go back and ascertain how far it would be just and equitable for us to accept the original bill introduced into this House by the distinguished chairman of the Census Committee, [Mr. COX,] a bill which provides for three hundred and one members of this House.

That gentleman told us yesterday that the number three hundred and one was more convenient and more fair than three hundred and eleven or three hundred and nineteen; that it would produce as little inequality as any other number that could be selected. Now, when we look at this matter on this side of the House in a partisan point of view, we are charged with doing something unfair. Yet examining that bill in that view, it will appear that the number three hundred and one would give to the States which we now commonly denominate the Southern States, to distinguish them from the Northern and free States, an advantage of four members.

Now, the majority of the Committee on the Census concluded that that was not enough advantage, that it would be better to find the only number perhaps that would give to the Southern States the advantage of six members, while the number which I favor, and the number favored by the minority of the committee, three hundred and nineteen, would give to neither section of the country, North or South, any advantage at all. It is the only number, so far as I have seen the figures, that fixes the apportionment exactly on an equality between the two sections so far as gains and losses are concerned. This matter of looking carefully to the interests of the North and South is not an original question with this Congress. It was the first question upon which the first President of the United States took issue with Congress. Out of apportionment legislation grew the first veto message ever signed by a President of the United States, and it was on the theory that the first apportionment bill submitted to him in 1793 was unfair to the South.

If the Clerk will now read the first veto message of April 5, 1792, I will then call attention to the history and the circumstances under which it came to be written and sent to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES, April 5, 1792.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I have maturely considered the act passed by the two Houses, entitled "An act for an apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the first enumeration;" and I return it to your House, wherein it originated, with the following objections:

First. The Constitution has prescribed that Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers; and there is no one proportion or divisor which, applied to the respective numbers of the States, will yield the number and allotment of Representatives proposed by the bill.

Second. The Constitution has also provided that the number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand; which restriction is, by the context, and by fair and obvious construction, to be applied to the separate and respective numbers of the States, and the bill has allotted to eight of the States more than one for every thirty thousand.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Mr. KEIFER. It will be found that by taking the number three hundred and one as a basis for the future House of Representatives there is "no one proportion or divisor which, applied to the respective numbers of the States, will yield the number and allotment of Representatives proposed by the bill," to use the exact language used by the President of the United States, George Washington.

Before going into a demonstration of that statement, I ask the Clerk to read—and I beg the attention of members to it—what Thomas Jefferson says on the subject of the history of that veto message. He will read an extract from Elliot's Debates on the Federal Constitution, volume 4, page 624.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President called on me before breakfast, and first introduced some other matter, then fell on the representation bill, which he had now in his possession for the tenth day. I had before given him my opinion in writing, that the method of apportionment was contrary to the Constitution. He agreed that it was contrary to the common understanding of that instrument, and to what was understood at the time by the makers of it; that yet it would bear the construction which the bill put; and he observed that the vote for and against the bill was perfectly geographical—a northern against a southern vote—and he feared he should be thought to be taking side with a southern party. I admitted the motive of delicacy, but that it should not induce him to do wrong, and urged the dangers to which the scramble for the fractionary members would always lead. He here expressed his fear that there would, ere long, be a separation of the Union; that the public mind seemed dissatisfied, and tending to this. He went home, sent for Randolph, the Attorney-General, desired him to get Mr. Madison immediately, and come to me; and if we three concurred in opinion, that he would negative the bill. He desired to hear nothing more about it, but that we draw up the instrument for him to sign. They came; our minds had been before made up; we drew the instrument. Randolph carried it to him, and told him we all concurred in it. He walked with him to the door, and, as if he still wished to get off, he said, "And you say you approve of this yourself?" "Yes, sir," says Randolph, "I do, upon my honor." He sent it to the House of Representatives instantly. A few of the hottest friends of the bill expressed passion, but the majority were satisfied, and both in and out of doors it gave pleasure to have at length an instance of the negative being exercised. Written this the 9th April.

Mr. KEIFER. My time will not permit me to occupy the attention of the House any further with the history of that matter. It shows that early in the constitutional history of this country this matter of apportionment was regarded as a very grave and important one. It was then believed that it was right and proper to find some common divisor that would be equitable and just to each and all of the States. There was a jealous eye to the interest of the Southern States in connection with that matter.

I state this in support of my non-partisan position on the subject of fixing a number for the Representatives of coming Congresses that will give no advantage either to the North or to the South.

If we look over this bill and make calculations upon it, we will find some queer figures, some queer results. I refer to the original bill upon the subject before this House. It will strike a man as rather curious, if he were not to go to the very foundation of all these peculiar relations of numbers, how it could happen that Ohio, with an increased population from 1870 to 1880 of 532,979, should under that bill lose one member of Congress, while South Carolina, with an increased population of a little more than one-half of that number, that is, 290,016, should gain one member.

The same thing may be said in reference to Mississippi. With an increased population from 1870 to 1880 of 203,670, that State gains one member under this bill, fixing the number at three hundred and one; while Ohio, with her gain of 533,000, loses one member. But this would lead us into some further explanation about the figures which I do not choose to go into. I simply state these mathematical curiosities in support of my claim that we ought to select a number that will be exactly fair. These singular results are not confined to a comparison of Ohio with other States. New York State, with an increased population from 1870 to 1880 of 701,051, under this bill loses two members, and Pennsylvania, with an increased population from 1870 to 1880, of 760,835, loses one member under the bill, while Mississippi with an increased population in the same time of only 203,670, and South Carolina with an increased population, also for the same time, of 290,016, each gain one member by the provisions of this bill. Other comparisons could be made with like results.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Has the gentleman made inquiry whether Ohio has not now more representation relatively to South Carolina than she ought to have?

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, no; I have taken the figures of 1870 as a fair apportionment with the ratio then adopted; then I take the ratio given now; and taking the difference between the census of 1870 as reported and the census of 1880 as reported, I find these singular results. The matter of fairness or unfairness in the taking of the census for either of the years 1870 or 1880 has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia rose.

Mr. KEIFER. I cannot yield further; I have not the time.

Now, I am not quite satisfied with the position of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] when he argues in favor of a large body of men as more likely to be a pure body. While I am not afraid of having the number increased, for other reasons which I will indicate, I am not quite satisfied that the reason the gentleman gave—that a large body of men is always the safest—is the right one. I understood him to say that the rule is universal in relation to large bodies of men being safer than small ones. History will prove that to be absolutely untrue, if the gentleman takes into account the fact that in other countries the methods of choosing such bodies and the powers that choose them have not recognized the people as the governing power. I wish to say as I pass along that when we get a perfectly pure body of men in our Republic, large or small, it will be a body representing the people of the several districts of the country who have had a fair opportunity to cast their ballots without fraud or intimidation and to have those ballots honestly counted and fairly returned. When the time shall come that we have that in this country we may expect to have a good and pure House of Representatives. If it has happened in other countries that small bodies of men have been more tyrannical than large, it will be found to be because some concentrated power other than the masses of the people has selected or chosen that small body of men, and therefore directed and controlled them.

I believe, however, in a reasonably large House of Representatives, in view of the great amount of work that we have to perform. The Constitution fixed 30,000 as the ratio of representation for the first apportionment. It was then supposed that one member for 30,000 inhabitants was enough, and only enough.

Now, with all the varied interests of this country, with all the subjects that our constituents are concerned about, with all the multiplication of duties growing out of our business here, it is proposed to adopt the ratio of 164,018 as the basis of representation here. This number is the ratio on which the original bill fixing the number of members at three hundred and one is based. The bill reported by a majority of the Census Committee fixing the number of members at three hundred and eleven is based on a ratio of 158,745, and the bill of the minority of that committee fixing the number at three hundred and nineteen is based on a ratio of 154,764. The ratio ten years ago was only 135,239, I believe.

We are expected to perform all our many duties promptly and well. There comes requisition after requisition upon members of Congress. It may be that many of these demands upon us are for the performance of duties that do not properly belong to our position here; but custom has made it the duty of every member of Congress to run errands to the Departments—to be a sort of counselor or adviser between the people and the different Departments where the business of the people is pending. If the number of Representatives is to be cut down and our constituencies increased, it will be impossible for us to perform the duties that these people expect of us. For that reason I am in favor of an increase on the basis of the figures I have named.

Turning aside for one moment in this discussion, I will say that there are some other remarkable figures and facts worked out under this census. My own State will not suffer on a basis of voting population, if such a basis could be adopted (and I do not say it could) under the Constitution. Ohio, I am happy to say, has a people not only free to vote when election day comes, but a people educated to vote, and who do vote. Let me state a fact that may not have been noted. At the election in November last, Ohio cast 103,046 more votes than were cast in the great State of Illinois, with substantially the same population, the population of Illinois being 3,078,769 as against 3,198,239 in Ohio. Now, this larger vote in Ohio comes from the freedom of the people to vote and also (for they are as free in Illinois) from the education of the people in the matter of voting. We have first tried before the people of Ohio the great issues of this country. We have tried the great financial issues there in advance of the nation. First in 1875 we fought the battle, and we won the financial victory as it has been won since by the people of this whole country.

The election returns coupled with the vote at the late election show some curious results in the North and West in the ability or willingness of the people to vote. Take the table of figures made up in round numbers, as follows:

| States. | Vote. | Population. | Per cent. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Illinois | 622,000 | 3,100,000 | 1 in 5.0 |
| Ohio | 725,000 | 3,200,000 | 1 in 4.4 |
| Indiana | 575,000 | 2,000,000 | 1 in 3.4 |
| Iowa | 323,000 | 1,600,000 | 1 in 5.4 |
| Kansas | 201,000 | 1,000,000 | 1 in 5.0 |

It will be seen that Indiana is a good voting State. The now good roads and accessibility of voting places in Ohio and Indiana may have something to do with the voters getting to the polls in a larger per cent. than in some other States.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] has given figures from the Southern States which in comparison to these would astonish the country if it was not already aware that something terrible was the matter with the voting population in those States.

Before taking my seat, I wish to say but one other thing in support of my proposition. Taking three hundred and one as the number, Ohio with nineteen members (which would be her apportionment under that number) would have one member for every 168,328; Mississippi one member for every 161,656; South Carolina one member for every 165,937; Louisiana one member for every 156,683. Thus, without taking the time to run through the list, it will be seen that my State is to be put at a disadvantage of several thousand in population, (to say nothing of votes,) as against these States of the South. Therefore I protest, Mr. Speaker, against a bill such as the one originally offered by the gentleman from New York; and I still more protest against the bill reported by the Committee on the Census, because it is still more unfair. I insist upon a fair number, one that will be just to each section. So far as I am concerned, (I do not speak for those around me,) I shall oppose, as does the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HORR,] any number that is unfair; and I will do it by every means known to the rules of parliamentary law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COLERICK. Mr. Speaker, in view of the lateness of the hour, and of the further fact that I have consented to yield one-half of the time accorded to me to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RYON,] I prefer, if it is agreeable to the House and satisfactory to that gentleman, that he should occupy the first half hour, and that the remaining half hour shall be reserved by me until to-morrow.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it is quite as important that we should determine the manner of electing the Representatives to this House as it is that we should determine the number which shall compose the popular legislative branch of this Government. In the discussion of this question, it is of the utmost importance to us that we should be guided by those plain, simple, constitutional provisions which determine the basis upon which representation shall rest. If there is anything settled by the uniform history of our Government it is that representation is based upon numbers—upon the number of inhabitants in the several States—and not alone or in any instance by the number of qualified electors. Any attempt to regulate representation by the qualification to vote, under the circumstances of this case and with the facts which are now before the country, would be utterly futile and lead to manifest injustice. We have no basis upon which we can act. The people voluntarily go to the polls if they go at all. Many of them remain at home. Therefore the constitutional provision of the country, that upon which we are bound to act, that which we are sworn to support and protect, requires that in apportionment of Representatives to the American House of Representatives we shall confine ourselves alone to the number of inhabitants which have been returned by the enumerators of the census as the basis of our work.

Now, while it is not my purpose to devote any time to the discussion of this aspect of the question raised and discussed by members on the floor of the House, I propose for a few moments to direct the attention of my fellow-members to a subject which I deem of the utmost importance in the determination of the question now before us.

The bill reported by the committee fixes the number of Representatives at three hundred and eleven, but it makes no provision whatever for the representation of new States which may be admitted into the Union, it is utterly and entirely silent on the subject of the admission of new States into the Union, and without legislation upon that subject either in the bill admitting the State or in the apportionment, States admitted after we have passed an apportionment bill would be without representation in Congress.

I propose in the discussion of this question, Mr. Speaker, to announce my purpose to add an amendment to this bill which shall authorize new States when admitted into this Union to have representation according to their population. In addition to that I find it has heretofore been the practice in making apportionments to determine in some way how the Representative shall be elected by the States either in single districts or by dividing the State or referring to the Legislatures of States the duty of determining the local divisions in the States which shall be entitled to Representatives. The minority of the committee reported a third section to the bill which they submitted to the House which, so far as it goes, meets every requirement of the law. But it is a part of the necessities of the case that additional safeguards should be adopted, and therefore I propose to move an amendment to attach to the third section of the bill reported by the minority. Section 3 as reported by the minority of the committee is taken from the apportionment act of 1871. I have added to the third section the provision which I now send up to the Clerk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall be unlawful to divide any county or parish where any district shall consist of more than one county or parish, and in all districts consisting of more than one county or parish the counties or parishes contiguous to each other having the number of inhabitants nearest to the ratio fixed by law for a Representative in the Congress of the United States shall be made a representative district.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. It will be noticed, Mr. Speaker, that the third section of this bill as reported by the minority of the committee provides that each State shall be divided into districts corresponding with the number of Representatives to which that State may be entitled; second, that the districts shall be composed of contiguous territory, and third, there shall be but one Representative from each district. Now, that provision which I have recited was contained in the apportionment act passed in 1871, and so far as it appears upon the report made by the minority of the committee it is copied verbatim from that act. But it falls short, as I have already said, of accomplishing any beneficial purpose in restraining the Legislatures of the States from committing what I regard as a crime against the free citizens of this Republic. Therefore, I provide in the amendment which I have submitted that there shall be no division of counties, that territory contiguous wherever a district is composed of more than one county shall contain the nearest possible number of inhabitants that will correspond with the ratio fixed by law. The words in the existing law which provide that contiguous territory containing as near as practicable an equal number of inhabitants to the ratio required by law shall be a district, have proved entirely insufficient as a warning to the Legislatures of the several States in determining this question of representation in Congress.

As nearly as practicable, says the law, leaving the Legislatures entire discretion over the whole subject of districting States for the purpose of representation, and it illustrates the old adage with a perfection that cannot be equaled, that "honeyed words butter no parsnips."

Now, a great deal has been said here upon the subject of disfranchising citizens entitled to exercise the privilege of franchise in the several States. A great deal has been said about "bulldozing" to prevent people who are entitled to cast their ballots according to their judgment, from doing so in certain States. I do not propose to discuss that question at any considerable length, but I propose to meet this subject upon grounds plain, fair, and reasonable, and to advocate such an apportionment of the Members of Congress as shall give to the people in this country fair, free, and honest elections, and a due representation upon the floor of Congress. I have no partisan claim of my own to advance in the discussion of this question, or in the support of the measures which I trust will be adopted; but what I do want and what I wish and shall strive to do, is to endeavor to prevent the disfranchisement of one-half of the population of this country by a system of reckless gerrymandering, and by which fully half of the people have no representative in the National Legislature.

In the first place I want to prevent the process of dividing counties. Well, gentlemen, you will say that you have not done it. In all the researches that I have given to the subject I have found but one State only besides Pennsylvania where this practice is carried on. In all the other States, I believe, counties have been yoked and united together in single districts; but in the State of Pennsylvania no such wholesome practice prevails. We divide counties there and unite the fragments in districts to accomplish partisan ends. We annex townships to counties and counties to townships. Another proposition which I advocate is that the counties contiguous to each other having the nearest population to the ratio fixed by law for a Representative in Congress shall be made into a congressional district. Does this hurt the people? No; by no means. The people have a right to it; it hurts nobody but the politicians who want to make districts for themselves or for their friends, who will use partisan power to accomplish the result; a result, let me say with emphasis to you here and now, that never can be followed in any free government without putting in peril civil liberty. Another proposition in that amendment is that the population, as I have already stated, nearest to the ratio fixed by law shall constitute a representative district. Now, sir, turning to actual practice upon the subject, we find that in districting States there has been no sort of regard whatever paid to the number of inhabitants fixed by law as the ratio of representation.

In support of this assertion I can point to the record. I can find districts that never had the population required by law, which have Representatives; districts in which thirty or forty or fifty thousand are allowed to elect a Representative; and upon the other hand thousands and thousands have been piled into a district in excess of the population required by law to answer partisan purposes. This thing should not be continued. My friends upon the other side, who claim to be friends of honest elections, who claim to be friends of the people, who claim that they want a fair apportionment, I ask you to join with me, then, in the support of such measures as shall give to the people of this country a representation in their National Legislature which is fair, honest, and equitable.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania point out where this has been done?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I will tell the gentleman where I know that it has been done. I will take the district represented by my friend Mr. KLOTZ, which has twenty townships annexed to it from Luzerne County. It is composed of four or five democratic counties——

Mr. KLOTZ. I would like to make a correction; they have added to it twenty townships and a half. [Laughter.]

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. They took some twenty townships from Luzerne County and added them with Columbia County to Carbon, Monroe, and Pike Counties, all democratic counties, thereby making a democratic district, with 10,000 democratic majority, with a population of 150,000 or 160,000 people. Take also the district of my colleague who represents Berks County. That district is below the ratio in the number of its inhabitants. It has but 106,000 inhabitants in it, and 130,000 is the ratio required by law. But Berks is democratic by 6,500, and there is no adjoining county that can be annexed to Berks to make a republican district. The little county of Lebanon on the west side, which with Berks would have made a district, has 1,500 republican majority. They could not afford to throw away that republican majority, and therefore they make him a district of 106,000 in it.

Let me again call the attention of the House to the district represented by my friend from Northampton, [Mr. BACHMAN,] the district composed of the counties of Northampton and Lehigh. These are heavy democratic counties. But they added to them a number of democratic townships from Bucks, leaving in the residue of Bucks a republican majority. Then they give to my colleague from Montgomery and Bucks all the remaining portion of Bucks County not included in the tenth district. Having abstracted the democratic majority from Bucks, how did they fix it up to make a republican district out of two democratic counties by adding the remaining part of Bucks to Montgomery? By making a very large democratic district for my friend, Mr. BACHMAN, they succeeded in getting up a pretty good republican district for my friend GODSHALK in two democratic counties. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE. Let me tell my friend that the democratic senator from Berks County, at the time of the apportionment, voted for and approved of the bill. And I think the democratic representatives from this northeastern portion of the State approved of it. They were all in favor of that apportionment.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Well, I think it is not the first time that democrats have sold their constituents for power. [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. WHITE. Do not blame the republicans, then, for it.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Now, they talk about the disfranchisement of the negro. He ought not to be disfranchised. His right to vote should be secured to him. I do not think my friend from Michigan or anywhere else could oppose such legislation any more heartily than I do. But I hope my friend will be equally emphatic in his condemnation of this system of gerrymandering. I give these Pennsylvania cases as illustrations, not because they are peculiar, for the whole system is wrong and it obtains everywhere. Let us correct the wrong by compelling a fair district system.

In the State of Pennsylvania, where we have 407,428 democrats, it takes 50,928 to send a Representative to this House. These 407,000 electors in Pennsylvania are represented by eight men upon this floor. The republican vote in 1880 was 444,704. It takes 23,450 republicans to elect a Representative to Congress. These 444,000 thousand republicans in the State of Pennsylvania are represented by nineteen men in this House. The city of Philadelphia has five Representatives on this floor. One is a democrat and four are republicans. It takes 75,000 democrats in that city to elect one democrat, and 94,000 republicans to elect four republicans.

Mr. O'NEILL. Let me state to the gentleman that the democrat from the city of Philadelphia never objected to the districting of the city which secured his return to this House.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. He never had any voice in the matter; besides democrats love to be disfranchised.

Mr. O'NEILL. The difficulty is that it was a hard matter to so apportion the city of Philadelphia as even to get in one democrat, the democratic population is so small.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. The republicans did not object to the apportionment.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. And though they have the power they have never attempted to correct the injustice.

Mr. WHITE. It cannot be corrected unless you can get the democratic votes more scattered. As it is now they all live in a bunch.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Every Representative on this floor from that city but one is a republican under that system of gerrymandering.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman ought to confine his attention to the rural districts rather than the city.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Now I propose to tell you how this is done.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope he will confine himself to his own district, then.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. In Pennsylvania, with 5,000,000 of people, every county in the State full of people and full of voters, we have districts one hundred and twenty miles long——

Mr. WHITE. My district is that long.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. And the lines are more crooked than any snake track made in the sand. [Laughter.] They take one or two strong republican counties and in the republican majority in these counties they sink one or two democratic counties, and in that way make a republican district. Thus they parceled out the State among themselves, as did those gentlemen who sat at the foot of the cross and divided our Saviour's raiment. They have done that all over the State. There are twenty-seven districts in the State and only one instance where they put a republican county in a democratic district. They put the little county of Union in a democratic district because they could not do anything else with it. They had nowhere else to put it.

Now, do you wish this state of things continued? I do not say that it is peculiar to Pennsylvania alone, for her politicians are about as honest as the average run of the country.

Mr. WHITE. Will my friend allow me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope the gentleman will allow that mistake to be corrected.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I cannot allow any more time to be taken up with questions.

Mr. WHITE. That apportionment was made in 1874, and since that time——

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. By a republican Legislature.

Mr. WHITE. Certainly; and since that time the republican aggregate majority of the State has been increasing. The people there approved of it and indorsed it.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I suppose you mean to say the republicans approved of it?

Mr. WHITE. The democrats approved of it, too.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. But there are machine republicans in Pennsylvania. The people there have stood more than any people on earth of dishonest and partisan legislation. The gentleman knows very well, because he has been there himself. [Laughter.]

Now, in the State of New York, in the State of Ohio, and in the State of Pennsylvania by this process of gerrymandering more white men are practically disfranchised than there are negroes in the South. I do not approve of it in the North any more than I do in the South. It is wrong anywhere and everywhere, and it is our duty to put a stop to it if we can. We can only stop it by adding to this bill such legislation as will render a repetition of such a wrong, such a crime, and such an offense against the people of this Republic impossible hereafter.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me, before he takes his seat——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. I move that the House now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, by unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MULLER, until Tuesday next; and

To Mr. RICHMOND, for one week from Monday, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER was granted leave to print in the RECORD as a portion of the debates an argument in favor of the bill (H. R. No. 2272) for the settlement of the accounts of certain States for moneys expended in the war of 1812. [See Appendix.]

SUPPLIES FOR INDIAN TRIBES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relative to the deficiency estimates for the issue of supplies to certain Indian tribes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FORT ASSINIBOINE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending an appropriation for Fort Assiniboine; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PURCHASE OF TELEGRAPH LINES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the following communications; which were severally referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

A letter from the Secretary of War, recommending the purchase of the Cheyenne and Black Hills telegraph line; and

A letter from the Secretary of War relative to the purchase of the Cheyenne and Black Hills telegraph line and the construction of telegraph lines in Oregon and in Washington Territory.

FREE BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC.

Mr. KLOTZ, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 7105) relating to the acqueduct of the Alexandria Canal Company, at Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and to provide a free bridge across the Potomac River on the piers of said acqueduct; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

SEED CANE.

Mr. KING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 7106) appropriating $20,000 for the purchase and distribution of seed cane; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

The motion of Mr. COX was then agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

---

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows, viz:

By Mr. WILLIAM ALDRICH: The petition of C. Feustel and others, of Geneva and Chicago, Illinois, for the reduction of the tax on cigars—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ANDERSON: The petition of citizens of Kansas, ex-soldiers, against the passage of the sixty-surgeons pension bill—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 4, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6969) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, is was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President.

And Mr. WINDOM, Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, and Mr. WITHERS were appointed the conferees.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6730) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. WALLACE, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President.

And Mr. WALLACE, Mr. BECK, and Mr. WINDOM were appointed the conferees.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 6729) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 372) authorizing the Public Printer to print reports of the United States Fish Commissioner upon new discoveries in regard to fish culture was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 388) to provide for publishing an edition of Hayden's Atlas of Colorado was read by its title.

Mr. ANTHONY. That joint resolution, I believe, is in totidem verbis like one passed by the Senate last week. I ask that it be put upon its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

The joint resolution was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copies of letters from Agents Miles and Hunt, of the Cheyenne and Arapaho, and Kiowa, Comanche, and Wichita agencies, Indian Territory, respectively, in connection with the deficiency estimate transmitted in his letter of the 21st ultimo; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Chief Signal Officer, recommending an appropriation for the purchase of the Cheyenne and Black Hills Telegraph Company's line; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting copies of papers relative to the abandonment of Camp Sheridan, Nebraska; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from General A. H. Terry, commanding the Department of Dakota, asking an additional appropriation of $45,000 to complete the post of Fort Assinaboine, in Montana Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War transmitting, in compliance with section 232 of the Revised Statutes, an abstract of the militia force of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the memorial of Alanson M. Randol, captain First Artillery, brevet colonel United States Army, remonstrating against the passage of the bills to restore to the Army William A. Winder and Dunbar R. Ransom, late captains Third Artillery; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KERNAN presented the memorial of C. H. Hull and others, Union soldiers, of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims and the amendments thereto; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PENDLETON presented the petition of T. E. Hoyt and others, of Ashtabula, Ohio, praying for the passage of the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions to the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of the Trades and Labor Assembly of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the passage of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 239) to provide for the enforcement of the eight-hour law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I present the petition of Mrs. Louisa L. Correll, Mrs. Mary Converse, and some 64 others, praying Congress to remove the legal disabilities imposed by the law-makers of the General Government in depriving them of their inherent right of suffrage. The petitioners also ask the Senate to appoint a standing or select committee, to whom papers relating to women's rights may be referred. In the absence of any such committee, I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Rules, to whom, I believe, a resolution was referred the other day on this same subject, and I hope we shall have a report on it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Similar petitions have heretofore gone to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have no objection to the reference to that committee. The reason why I suggested a reference to the Committee on Rules is because a resolution for the appointment of a committee on this subject was referred to that committee. Let it take the same course that has been adopted in reference to such petitions heretofore.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McDONALD presented the memorial of John R. Carr and other citizens of Rushville, Indiana, surviving soldiers of the war for the Union, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims, and the amendments thereto; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of an appropriation for the construction of locks and dams at Goose Rapids on the Red River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Stillwater, Minnesota, praying for an appropriation of $1,000,000 to be expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, for the improvement of the Mississippi River, one-half of said amount to be used from Saint Paul to the Des Moines Rapids, and the remaining half from the Des Moines Rapids to the mouth of the Illinois River, all to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War; which was referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WITHERS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2044) granting a pension to Martha J. Porter, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 859) to authorize the claimants to certain lands in Los Angeles County, California, to submit their claims to the United States district court for that State for adjudication, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt, to report it with amendments. I will take leave to ask the attention of the Senate to this bill as soon as it shall be printed, because in view not only of the importance of the subject but of the necessity for prompt action upon it, I propose to call it up for the consideration of the Senate at an early day, next week—as early as possible.

Mr. GROOME, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 8) granting a pension to Elizabeth T. Winder, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2052) for the relief of Alfred E. Jaques, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3772) granting a pension to Samuel Burwell, have directed me to report it adversely. At the request of a member of the committee, I ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CALL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1673) granting a pension to Leonhard Weber, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLAIR. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 788) for the relief of James J. Ferris, to submit an adverse report thereon. In order to guard against any misapprehension upon the part of the applicant, I will say that this bill is adversely reported for the reason that the Pension Department has since taken action on the matter.

The report was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am instructed by the Select Committee on the bill (S. No. 227) to provide that the principal officer of each of the Executive Departments may occupy a seat on the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives, to report the bill with an amendment. I give notice that I shall, at a convenient time and as soon as possible, call up the bill for discussion.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 881) for the relief of Judson S. Post, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

NATIONAL MUSEUM.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 7098) making an appropriation for the flooring of the National Museum, to report it without amendment. The bill has already passed the House, and I desire that it may be read, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let the bill be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say that this bill should have been considered yesterday. It is important to have its immediate consideration because, although the sum appropriated is no more than will be required for putting tiles in the Museum, it is thought to be exceedingly desirable that the bill should pass now, in order that a certain portion of the building may be available for the 4th of March.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I recognize the necessity for immediate action, and therefore do not object, but I should like to ask the Senator if this appropriation covers the entire expense for tiling the museum?

Mr. MORRILL. I so understand it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $26,000 to place a flooring of marble and encaustic tiles in the large halls of the National Museum building, to be expended according to the plans and under the direction of the building commission of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, under whose supervision the museum has been constructed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I noticed from the reading of the bill that it provides for only one room, which is a large part of the building. I do not know why there should be two parts of the appropriation. I ask the Senator how that is?

Mr. MORRILL. I must say that I have not made particular inquiries as to that. A portion of the building, I understand, is to be covered with a pine floor or concrete. This appropriation is all that is asked for, and it is all that I know anything about.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state to the Senator from West Virginia, with the permission of the Senator from Vermont, that this is designed simply to provide a paving for the central hall of the museum building. Other portions of it are to be floored with plank. The central building is now completed with a flooring merely according to the original plan. It is designed to pave it with marble and tiles. That is the whole of it.

Mr. MORRILL. And if the bill passes to-day, I understand there is some chance for the completion of the flooring in time for the inauguration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HAYDEN'S ATLAS OF COLORADO.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 388) to provide for publishing an edition of Hayden's Atlas of Colorado, to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Select Committee to examine the several branches of the Civil Service to submit an amendment to be proposed to the general appropriation bill. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear it read.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

> The sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to enable the President to execute the provisions of section 1753 of the Revised Statutes for the promotion of efficiency in the different branches of the civil service.

The amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLATT asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2152) granting a pension to Phebe W. Ross; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2153) relinquishing the right of the United States to an island therein named; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EATON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 151) directing the Secretary of State to withhold payment of certain Mexican awards; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. EATON. I desire the joint resolution to be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, First. That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, directed to withhold any further distribution of the sums of money paid to the Government of the United States by the Government of Mexico under the convention of July 4, 1868, between the two said governments, so far as the same are applicable to the claims of Benjamin Weil and La Abra Silver Mining Company, allowed by the commission organized to carry said convention into effect, until the further action of Congress.

Second. That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, directed to invest so much of the money as is applicable to the claims mentioned in the preceding section in bonds of the United States bearing the lowest rate of interest, which, with the accumulation thereof, shall be held in trust to answer such further disposition of the same as Congress may direct to be made, or such further proceedings as may be had by the two said governments in the premises.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. EATON. No, I do not wish a reference. I wish to say one word. I have received information which I regard as reliable, that these two claims are absolutely frauds upon the Government of Mexico. Installments have already been paid on those claims. There is money now in the hands of the Secretary of State for distribution, and I am informed that certain installments will be called for next week. Therefore, if my opinion be correct with regard to the fact that these claims are fraudulent, the joint resolution ought to pass, and the money ought to be withheld until further action, and placed in securities of the United States to await the further action of Congress. I should be glad to have the joint resolution acted upon to-day. However, I shall not ask for action now, but let it be printed, and I shall call it up to-morrow during the morning hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be printed and lie on the table subject to the call of the Senator from Connecticut.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. HARRIS and Mr. JONAS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 5097) appropriating money toward the expense to be incurred in the centennial celebration of the battle on Groton Heights, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

STEAMER JEANNETTE.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to call up for consideration the bill (S. No. 2131) appropriating money, to be used under the direction of the Navy Department, to prosecute a search for the steamer Jeannette, of the Arctic exploring expedition.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. McPHERSON. It will not take more than ten minutes to dispose of the bill, and I say to the Senator from Missouri that it stands entirely alone with respect to its weight for consideration. I hope no Senator will object to its being considered now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order, if the morning business is through.

Mr. McPHERSON. I shall ask, then, the indulgence of the Senate for a vote to take up the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, that the pending order, being the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the standing order of the day, be postponed in order that the bill indicated may now be considered.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think I can make it perfectly clear when the bill is brought before the Senate that it is one entitled to immediate consideration by the Senate.

Mr. McDONALD. What is the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported by title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish simply to state before the motion is put to the Senate that it seems to me as though the Senate could scarcely afford to delay action upon a measure so important and humane as this. The vessel Jeannette, which was purchased, repaired, and fitted out by Mr. James Gordon Bennett, whose progressive spirit in all things is entitled to all commendation, has not been seen since the 2d day of September, 1879. Grave doubts are entertained as to her safety. A call has been made upon the Government for succor, for some vessel to be equipped and sent to the Arctic regions for the purpose of discovering whether the Jeannette is in need of aid or not. I think the experience of the past fully demonstrates that it is the duty of this Government to provide relief for those people if they are in a suffering condition. We should remember that in the case of Sir John Franklin's expedition an appeal was made to the people of this country for relief one year before the first expedition to relieve the exploring party sailed. If that relief had been granted when the appeal was first made it would have saved, perhaps, two hundred lives, but the relief was not granted in time, and the consequences we all know.

I do not believe there is a single Senator in this body who would refuse an appropriation of money for so meritorious and humane an object; and unless this action be taken immediately it will be impossible for the bill to be passed by the House and the aid so much needed, perhaps, accorded to this expedition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, that the pending order be postponed in order that the bill named by him may now be considered.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill named.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 2131) appropriating money, to be used under the direction of the Navy Department, to prosecute a search for the steamer Jeannette of the Arctic exploring expedition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, which will be read.

Mr. McPHERSON. I shall offer an amendment as a substitute for the bill, and therefore the amendment reported by the committee will be entirely unnecessary. I desire to state to the Senate that the bill was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and was reported back by that committee favorably to the Senate, appropriating $100,000 as the sum deemed to be necessary by the Navy Department to fit out a vessel of war. The vessel designated by the Department was the Wachusett, now in the Pacific Ocean. That vessel could reach San Francisco and could probably be refitted, repaired, strengthened, &c., to do all the necessary work upon this expedition, for the sum of about one hundred thousand dollars. That was the estimate of the Department, and the estimates are here, included in a communication sent by the Secretary of the Navy and addressed to myself, which I should like the Secretary to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 4, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to forward the accompanying estimates of the cost of fitting a vessel for arctic search for the Jeannette and lost whalers.

If the Wachusett be selected she will require in—

|---|---|
| Construction department | $20,000 |
| Engineering | 10,000 |
| Provisions and clothing | 52,000 |
| Equipment and contingencies | 18,000 |
| | 100,000 |

If a whaler be purchased, as is recommended, this amount would have to be increased to cover probable cost; and to prepare her for a more thorough search than can be made by a vessel of war under the most favorable circumstances, there will be required $175,000.

The Navy Department recommends the purchase of a whaler, as the number of men required to man her will be but about thirty, (30,) while not less than one hundred and twenty (120) will be requisite for the Wachusett, thus quadrupling the risk of loss. The Wachusett is also too large and unmanageable in ice for the purpose, and will not be so efficient. She will probably be a loss to the Navy and can be illy spared; while the purchased vessel can be either sold or retained as a useful addition to the Navy.

A similar vessel, the Tigress, was purchased in 1873, to search for the crew of the Polaris, at a cost of $60,000, and $22,000 were expended in preparing her for the purpose, not including any outfits, and was resold to same owners.

Respectfully, &c.,

N. GOFF, JR.,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. J. R. McPHERSON,
Chairman Naval Committee, United States Senate.

Mr. McPHERSON. The bill considered by the Naval Committee and reported back is the bill that has been read by the Secretary, appropriating $100,000. It was the intention at that time to fit out this particular vessel, which could be done at an expenditure of about one hundred thousand dollars; but upon consideration the risk was deemed to be a greater one than was necessary or expedient. The Wachusett is worth about three hundred thousand dollars. The cost of fitting her out will amount to $100,000 more; so that in reality we would place at the risk of the perils of arctic navigation a vessel worth about four hundred thousand dollars. The vessel is too long and too unwieldy for arctic service; would require a great deal of strengthening, and perhaps would be injured by the ice-floes of the arctic seas. There are other vessels now on the Pacific coast, one of them a vessel named the Mary and Helen which has been constructed in Bath, Maine. A description of that vessel has also been furnished me by the Department. The vessel is one hundred and forty-four feet long, has thirty-one feet beam and sixteen and a half feet depth. The capacity for coal in bunkers is one hundred and fifty tons, and in the hold one hundred and fifty tons more can be stowed away. It is solid from the stem twenty-four feet aft; the sides are thirty-three inches in thickness, including the sheathing; and it steams eight knots per hour on four tons of coal per day. It works remarkably well under sail, and the propeller is about double the usual weight in order to resist the ice. The memorandum of the Secretary of the Navy in regard to these steam-whalers says further:

One of these vessels, the Mary and Helen, is in San Francisco at the present time. Another one, the Belvidere, left New Bedford, on the 17th of August last, for the Sandwich Islands, and is probably there now.

These vessels have been built under the direction of men of thirty years' arctic experience, and there are no better vessels for arctic work than these.

The Navy Department upon reconsidering the case have decided to recommend that one of these vessels be purchased, and be fitted out, and repaired at an expense not to exceed $75,000 in addition to the original cost. I understand these vessels have cost the company under whose orders they were built for the purpose of engaging in the whaling business in the arctic regions about eighty thousand dollars or ninety thousand dollars. They ask the Government $100,000 for one vessel. Two of them now on the way are entirely new vessels, and the one at San Francisco is comparatively new, having seen only one year's service.

This vessel if purchased by the Government could very easily be sold to the same company for the like service perhaps for a sum of money approximating its cost. So in reality, that is, provided no accident or catastrophe should happen, the entire expense ultimately to the Government will not be an expenditure greater than $75,000 or $100,000. I therefore move on behalf of the committee, although without consultation with its members, because I have not had time to do so, an amendment adopting the view taken by the Navy Department. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and to insert by way of amendment the following:

That the sum of $175,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be and is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be applied under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy to the immediate charter or purchase, equipment, and supply of a vessel in the prosecution of a search for the steamer Jeannette, of the arctic exploring expedition, and such other vessels as may be found to need assistance during said cruise.

I desire to say further that there are two whaling vessels that are supposed to be in distress somewhere in the Arctic Sea. Last summer the revenue steamer Corwin, under command of Captain Hooper, was sent to the Arctic regions in search of the whalers, and also to render such aid as might be needed to the Jeannette. Captain Hooper cruised around for several months, but his cruise was unsuccessful. He was forced to return without even having discovered any trace either of the whalers or of the Jeannette. The Jeannette was last seen in the vicinity of Wrangel's Land, and the floes of ice and the storms were so great in that region during the time she was making her cruise that it was almost impossible, in fact impossible, for her to reach Wrangel's Land owing to her insufficiency of strength and power to go through the ice.

Therefore it is proposed to adopt the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy and purchase one of the whaling ships, fit her out with all the necessary appliances, to go in quest of not only the crew of the lost whalers but also of the Jeannette. In case the Jeannette should be found not to be in a distressed condition it certainly would be to the interest of the project that some relief be granted her. She will need additional coal; she will need additional supplies of fresh provisions. The maimed and the sickly upon board that vessel could be removed and supplied by other and stronger men, and the project itself would be humane in its start, and, while in the interest of humanity, it would perhaps result greatly to the interest of science.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that the language "in a prosecution of a search" is perhaps not quite adequate in strict law. What we wish to do is not only to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to expend this money, but to authorize him to send this vessel forth with his officers and men, I suppose. Therefore, I think we ought to say instead of "in the prosecution," "for the prosecution of such a search which the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to undertake" so as to make it clear. Probably it will be construed that way now; but in legislating it is well enough to have the language perfectly clear. I suggest that merely.

Mr. McPHERSON. I considered that the language of the amendment covered the idea entirely, but I will accept the modification suggested by the Senator from Vermont.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will make it perfectly clear at any rate so that there will not be any haggling about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey as modified.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall vote for this amendment, and as at present advised, I shall vote for this bill; but I wish to say that I think, whenever I have been present in the Senate when original expeditions have been provided for, or aided, I have always voted against them for experience has proved in the civilized history of mankind that the constant warfare against the north pole which civilized nations are undertaking from time to time is a losing warfare on every occasion, losing in all respects, and that that quantum which is gained for science is entirely outweighed by the suffering and loss of life and property (if loss of property can be named in connection with loss of life) by whoever undertakes it. But we did authorize and contribute to in one way and another the sending out of the Jeannette, and, therefore, I am perfectly willing to vote to have a search made to get her out of the difficulty which it was morally certain she would be in, and which it is almost equally certain that this vessel, if she pursues that unfortunate craft to where she may be, if she is above the surface of the seas anywhere with her officers and crew, stands ninety-nine chances in one hundred of being ingulfed and beset in the ice and will require further efforts to extricate her. But we have entered upon the affair, and I am willing as at present advised, to run the risk of trying to get at it once more, and I hope that when we get them if we happily can, we shall be a little cautious about encouraging any such fruitless and destructive expeditions.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I am glad to hear the Senator from Vermont propose to vote for the passage of this bill; but I must say that I quite disagree with him in respect to what I think should be the policy of this Government in regard to arctic exploring expeditions. So long as the American people exist and the north pole remains undiscovered, we shall have enterprising and progressive spirits, like Mr. James Gordon Bennett, who will be seeking to find it; and unlike the honorable Senator from Vermont, I expect to live long enough yet to see a Polaris edition of the New York Herald published at the north pole, and I hope this vessel to be sent out in search of the Jeannette will so strengthen and support her that she may be able to reach that desired spot. The north pole will probably be of no more value, when found, to Mr. Bennett than it will be to the Senator from Vermont, therefore his noble yet disinterested endeavor to find it is entitled to and will receive the gratitude of all men. Mr. Bennett has generously given every dollar of money needed to fit out the most perfect expedition which has yet been launched for the discovery of the yet hidden mysteries which surround the pole; and, for myself, I propose to meet his efforts in the same liberal spirit which has characterized his action in all he has done in support of this great enterprise.

And, sir, when we come to consider the experience of the past with respect to our polar excursions or expeditions, we find that the loss of life has been comparatively small, the percentage of loss of life very small in proportion to those who have engaged in these enterprises. The first expedition started out under Grinnell consisted of two brigs, the Advance and the Rescue. They sailed northward until they encountered floes of ice, were frozen in the ice, and floated to the seventy-fifth degree of north latitude and back again southerly to the sixty-fifth degree while confined and tied up in icebergs. During that entire period there was scarcely any loss of life; the vessels became released by reason of the active efforts of those on board by sawing and wedging and the action of the sun, and when they were relieved they started back again upon their cruise.

The second Grinnell expedition, consisting of the Advance alone, was finally abandoned in the northern seas, and her crew started over land by a long and tedious trip and were finally rescued by Captain Hartstein's expedition. That was a relief expedition, sent out for the purpose, whereas, if no relief had been sent, the probability is that the crew of that vessel would have perished.

We all remember the Resolute, which was a part of the Sir Edward Belcher exedition to the arctic seas, a part of his fleet of five vessels. She encountered ice-floes, and was confined in a cake of ice from 1853 till 1855, having been abandoned by her crew, and floated over twelve hundred miles. In 1855 she was discovered and released from her perilous condition; she was brought safely into port, was repaired, and presented to the English Government, she having been a part of the expedition which was fitted out in Great Britain.

I think the experience of the past fully demonstrates that it is possible to reach the north pole by some means, and I believe it appears to be the opinion of scientific men generally that the route adopted by Mr. Bennett—namely, by way of Behring Straits—is the one through which we shall eventually reach the pole, as what are called the Japanese currents are all tending toward the pole, while by the Baffin's Bay route, the one heretofore pursued by all expeditions, the current is outwardly.

I trust and believe that the enterprise of the American people will eventually find the pole, and give us the benefit of the astronomical, meteorological, and geological surveys that they may there be able to make, which I think will be of vast benefit to the people of the world.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 5097) appropriating money toward the expense to be incurred in the centennial celebration of the battle of Groton Heights, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

GENERAL U. S. GRANT.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call up Senate bill No. 1992, and I move that the present and all prior orders be postponed temporarily for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois moves that the pending order, being the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the standing order of the day, be postponed.

Mr. INGALLS. It has been postponed already, I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. For the consideration of one bill just passed.

Mr. INGALLS. That could not be done. It had to be postponed generally or not at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was postponed, but the Senator stated his object to be for the consideration of the bill just passed.

Mr. INGALLS. That could not control the action of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the question on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order, and that will test the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As many as favor the motion of the Senator from Illinois will say "ay." [Putting the question.]

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be reported by its title, so that we may know what it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. No. 1992) to place Ulysses S. Grant, late General and ex-President of the United States, upon the retired list of the Army.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. WALLACE, (after having voted in the negative.) I withdraw my vote. I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania.]

Mr. HAMLIN. When my name was called I did not vote as the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] with whom I was paired, was out of his seat. He has since come in and voted, and therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. PLUMB. On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] who was called away from the Senate yesterday. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER. I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN,] and the Senator from Georgia, who is present, [Mr. HILL,] considers this a political question, and therefore I refrain from voting. If the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] were here I should vote "yea."

Mr. BAILEY, (after having voted in the negative.) I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK.] I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. BALDWIN. My colleague [Mr. FERRY] is paired on all political questions—and this seems to have been made a political question—with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.] If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. EATON, (after having voted in the negative.) I was paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] for yesterday; but he seems not to be in his seat, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) The vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. LAMAR. I was not in when the roll-call was made. I should like to say just a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will proceed if there be no objection.

Mr. LAMAR. I am willing to consider this bill, but I think other matters more important are pressing, and therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. BAILEY. An arrangement has been made by which my pair has been transferred to the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK.] I vote "nay."

Mr. PLUMB. Then I shall vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 30; as follows:

FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call up Senate joint resolution No. 140, which was reported back by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads yesterday, in regard to the extension of the franking privilege. The resolution was up in the Senate before, referred to the committee, and reported back without amendment; and I should be very glad, if there is no necessity for any discussion upon it, if the Senate would take it up and have action on it. I ask that it be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks consent to take up the resolution he has indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is the asking for consent. The Chair understands the call of the Senator from Missouri as in the nature of an objection.

Mr. INGALLS. The regular order has been laid aside by a vote of the Senate; and it is in order for the Senator from Illinois to move this resolution or any other without asking anybody's consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the custom of the Senate is, when the Calendar is laid aside for a special purpose announced, after that matter has been disposed of the Calendar revives; and the Chair understood that to be practically the ruling of the Vice-President just now when after the suggestion was made by the Senator from Kansas the Vice-President still submitted a motion to lay aside the pending order to the Senate which has been negatived.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not understand the Vice-President to decide that. The Senator from New Jersey asked unanimous consent that the pending order, which was the consideration of cases on the Calendar under the Anthony rule, might be informally laid aside to enable him to take up the Jeannette relief bill. The regular order was called for; objection was made, and the question was submitted to the Senate whether the pending order should be laid aside or not, and decided in the affirmative; and whatever the motive of the Senator from New Jersey might have been, that could not control the action of the Senate. The pending order was laid aside, the other bill was considered; and now I submit respectfully that the Senator from Illinois is in order in moving this resolution, and the Senator from Missouri cannot call for the regular order because it has been laid aside by the vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would remind the Senator from Kansas that although the suggestion which he has now made was made, the Vice-President proceeded to put the question on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to lay aside the pending order the second time, which has just been voted on. The Chair will submit to the Senate the question.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Chair indulge me one moment? If the ruling of the Chair is correct, I voted under a misapprehension. I understood that the question was upon taking up the bill to place General Grant upon the retired list, and not on laying aside the order. I so voted, and I think that was the understanding of the Senate that we were voting directly upon the bill.

Mr. DAWES. If the parliamentary view of the Senator from Kansas is correct, it would require a vote of the Senate to restore the regular order. I have never known that. If the regular order, though laid aside for a special purpose, is laid aside for the day, we cannot of course resume the regular order without a vote of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Of course not. No parliamentary rule is better settled than that.

Mr. LOGAN. Inasmuch as the Chair has made a ruling I will move the postponement of the present and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up this joint resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. Before that motion is submitted I should like to be advised what the Journal says in regard to the last vote of the Senate that was taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that any ruling has been made by him. The Chair merely called the attention of the Senator from Kansas for his consideration in reference to the point he was making to what the Chair understood to have been the course of proceeding of the Vice-President.

Mr. INGALLS. The Chair does not understand me. I asked upon what question the yeas and nays were last called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The record so far as it be a record of yeas and nays of the Journal Clerk is:

On motion of Mr. LOGAN to lay aside the pending orders, &c.

That is the motion which the Chair understands to have been voted on.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not intend to vote on that motion; I thought I was voting to take up.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I simply wish to say that I voted a moment ago, and I was not aware that I was giving a vote the effect of which would be or might be to displace the pending order, the resolution of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in relation to the electoral count. I would give no vote to displace that order. If I gave a vote that might displace it, I did so under a misapprehension.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the pending order now, and will not be until half past one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves to lay aside the pending order, indicating his purpose to be to move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 140.

Mr. LOGAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Now, will the Chair state the question so that we may vote understandingly?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] moves to lay aside the present and all pending orders, he stating the purpose of his motion to be to move to take up the resolution in relation to the franking privilege.

Mr. TELLER. I want to know what the pending order is before I vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the pending order to be the Calendar of General Orders.

Mr. TELLER. All right.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] on political questions. As this seems to be taking that direction, I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—20.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of half-past one having arrived, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President of the Senate is not invested by the Constitution of the United States with the right to count the votes of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States so as to determine what votes shall be received and counted or what votes shall be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to this resolution? upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I infer from something that was said by some Senators last evening in regard to the fact that several Senators present in the Chamber did not vote on the passage of the resolution, or whatever the question then was, that it was supposed that those Senators had a purpose or intent to obstruct the action of the Senate. For one, I wish to disabuse the minds of Senators on that subject, and to say that so far as I am concerned, and so far as I know as to others, any such impression is groundless.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I have no objection to the Senator from Vermont going on by unanimous consent; I am willing to consent for one; but the question is on the passage of the resolution; the yeas and nays have been called; one vote has been taken; members have answered to their names, and certainly no remarks are now in order except by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont proceeds by unanimous consent, as the Chair understands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not proceed by unanimous consent, with great respect to my friend from Ohio and to the Chair. The yeas and nays were ordered; all the names that answered on the roll were called, and it turned out that there was no quorum of the Senate present for action. The call of the names of Senators, therefore, entirely fell, and the Chair has restated the question as he ought to do, and stated that the yeas and nays have been ordered and they have to be taken from the beginning, and until the first name on the roll-call answers I am entitled to be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate whether the Senator from Vermont is entitled to proceed.

Mr. THURMAN. Then it is debatable. I wish to say in support of my point of order—I believe I am entitled to state it——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course it is open to debate.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say that yesterday the yeas and nays were ordered; the roll was called; Senators answered to their names; a quorum did not vote; and before anything further was done, except some little skirmishing, the Senate adjourned. The Senate could do nothing but call the roll or adjourn, if there was not a quorum. I do not forget a ruling—for I made it myself and was sustained by the Senate—that the fact that a quorum has not voted is not conclusive of the fact that a quorum is not present.

There can be no question that the Senate could not have gone on last night, because the only things that were in order, if there were no quorum present, were to call the roll and enforce attendance, if the Senate saw fit to enforce it, or to adjourn. The Senate adjourned. It may be that there is a difference because the Senate is now met on another day, and it is presumed that there is a quorum present or we should not be transacting business. That may raise some doubt about it. It may be that my point is not well taken on that ground; and as I do not want to take up time, on the suggestion of the Senator who has the resolution in charge, I withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No objection being made, the Senator from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not wish to proceed, no objection being made; I wish to proceed as a matter of right and not by by unanimous consent.

Mr. THURMAN. I have withdrawn my point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Chair submitted the question. I do not object to its being withdrawn, for I am sure my friend from Ohio on a moment's reflection will admit that it is untenable.

Mr. THURMAN. I believe I can withdraw a point at any time before the yeas and nays are ordered. I have withdrawn it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Chair has withdrawn the submission of the question to the Senate, I will address the Chair and begin again.

The time may come, and I think it will before a great while, when it will be desirable for my friend from Ohio, and his political associates, not to endeavor to exert any very strong tyranny, by force of constructions of rules, over minorities. I stand up for the rights of minorities, as he generally does if he stands up for his party, as he does bravely; and it would be rather a new thing on principles of parliamentary law or on principles of justice, that a question having been put and the result announced showing that no action had been taken at all, and requiring a resubmission of the question to the Senate when it should be in a condition to act, a Senator should not be entitled to speak, or to move amendments, or to do whatever under the general rules he would be entitled to do. I never heard of such a point before, and I doubt if I shall ever hear of it again.

That being dismissed, Mr. President, I will proceed to state what I was about to state before. There seemed to be an impression last evening, that Senators who did not vote for or against this resolution were resorting to what are called filibustering or obstructing tactics; and I was saying that so far as I am concerned, and so far as I know or believe, that was a false impression. I certainly—and I believe I can say so for every other Senator on this side of the Chamber—had no disposition to exert what sometimes may be a right and a duty, on this occasion, by any step which would tend to prevent the Senate from coming to a vote in the ordinary way, after suitable discussion, and after trial of such amendments as Senators choose to suggest.

But I felt for myself, and I presume a good many other Senators felt, that after we had asked of the gentleman in charge of this performance what was the object to be gained under existing circumstances, what was the danger to be averted under existing circumstances, and got no reply, and taking that in connection with the fact that differing from every other species of business before this body, this resolution had never been sent to any committee, had never been reported from any committee, but was, as is universally understood, the midnight work of a secret conclave—more or less secret I will say—of the body of the people who have been undertaking to govern this country for the last four years in that way, there was good ground to be a little shy of leaping before we came to the stile, without going into any declarations, however true they might be, upon abstract questions, unless we went into the whole subject and covered it, and then covered it by the report of a committee that should agree in telling us precisely what the language meant, precisely what it implied, and precisely what implications should not be drawn from saying one thing and not saying another, when that other thing was part of the transaction referred to.

In that state of the case, with my construction of this resolution, believing it to be a true statement as far as it goes, and therefore not wishing to appear by any possible construction to deny it, I did not wish to vote against it. After what I have said also on the matters to which I have referred, I did not wish, and I do not wish and I do not intend, to vote for it, because I think I can see that by an ingenious construction and considering the implications, these two Houses, if they agree to this resolution, are asserting what is tantamount to a doctrine that does not appear on the face of this resolution correctly read as I think; but other Senators, a majority, may read it in a different way and may raise out of it a crop of recognitions of powers neither regulated by statute nor rule that I do not propose to recognize just now.

So I felt justified, as a Senator responsible to the people of the United States and to my immediate constituents that appoint me, in not voting either way upon the proposition, and for those reasons. And I remembered what a distinguished Senator, the chief and head rightly of the democratic party in this Chamber, had said on a former occasion when a similar question of not voting arose; and I think what he then said is my perfect justification upon sound ground of what I omitted to do last night, and I will ask leave to read it.

This was on the 23d of February, 1871, in this body, when a republican Senator who moved to proceed to the consideration of a bill protecting the rights of citizens of the United States to vote for members of Congress and so on—that was the substance of the title, I do not read it with precision because I do not wish to occupy time unnecessarily—and on the question of taking up that bill sundry Senators failed to vote, and the Senate found itself without a quorum voting. Then the Senator who had charge of the bill and wished to take it up, said:

Then I call the attention of the Senate and of the Chair to the rule which imposes upon Senators present the obligation of voting, and in that connection I call attention to the fact that the honorable Senator from Ohio,

Then in brackets, I suppose put in by the Reporter, comes the name—

[Mr. THURMAN,] the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. CASSERLY,] the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] and the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] all being now in their seats, according to my hearing of the roll have not voted although their names have been called.

Then follows a quantity of cross talk which I would be glad to take time to read but I will not, and I come to the definitive declaration (which what with certain limitations I agree to) of the duty of Senators on some subjects. The Chair had said, although he afterward reversed that ruling, that the names of the not voting Senators should be called just as I believe somebody on the other side asked that they might be called last night. From that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] appealed, and then proceeded to say:

Now, Mr. President, let us see what the result of this rule would be. The result would be that you could introduce a debatable question between the call of the roll and the announcement of the vote. To say that any business can intervene between the call of the roll and the announcement of the vote is to say that the announcement may be postponed indefinitely; because if one kind of business can be interposed another can be interposed. Suppose the Senator from New York calls the attention of the Senate to the fact that certain Senators have declined to vote, and their names are called again and they still decline to vote; what then? What is to be done? Are they to be censured? Are they to be punished in any way? If so, they are at least to have a trial; they are to be heard before they are punished; they are to be tried before they are executed; and you have between the call of the roll and the announcement of the vote the trial of just as many Senators as shall decline to vote. Why, sir, there would be no taking a vote under such circumstances.

Now, sir, this very question was determined on the Virginia bill; this very question was decided on the Virginia bill. On the Virginia bill there was not a democratic Senator voting. They stated the reasons why they did not vote. They stated that they would not vote against the bill because they wished Virginia represented on this floor; but they could not vote for the bill because it contained provisions which, in their judgment, were unconstitutional, and therefore they could not vote for it. They were not the only Senators who did not vote on that bill. There were republican Senators who sat in their seats and did not vote. After that vote was taken the then Senator from Missouri, I think it was, (Mr. Drake,) called the attention of the Chair to the fact that the democratic Senators had sat in their seats and had not voted on that bill, and the Chair then decided that there was no power to compel them to vote. That was the decision; a decision that was acquiesced in by the Senate.

Never in the history of the Senate has there been an attempt made to coerce a Senator to vote. A Senator may have various reasons for not wishing to vote. He may have good reasons for not wishing to vote. Bills come up here upon which he may lack information and not be able to vote one way or the other, and he may withhold his vote. But what is this that we are now told? Here you are asked to take some measures, I suppose, against four democratic Senators. Why take measures against them? Because without them, I believe, you have no quorum. That is the only reason. Where are your sixty-three republican Senators, that you have to assume an extraordinary jurisdiction to punish or compel four democratic Senators to vote in order to constitute a quorum?

If you wish to debate this matter, let it be debated, and let us see what will come of it. I say there is no mode known to the usages of the Senate by which you can compel a Senator to vote. On his own responsibility to his constituents and his duty as a Senator he decides that question for himself.

That, Mr. President, I say is sound sense; but I would add this limitation: I should say that it is within the power of the Senate, not to compel a Senator to vote, because that would be like the old-fashioned illustration of taking a horse to the trough and compelling him to drink; you cannot do it, but you can punish him for a contempt of the Senate in refusing to do his duty in obedience to the rules in not voting, whether he thinks he ought to vote or not. Undoubtedly you have that legal power for the rules provide for it, and I do not take any time now to go into a discussion of the question whether they do or not. I only say that in my opinion the Senator from Ohio stated on that occasion what on all occasions when there is a quorum present every Senator recognizes to be the right and just practice and rule, and that is that every Senator must be left to judge for himself whether he is prepared to take the responsibility then and there of saying "yes" or "no" to a particular conundrum—to borrow the phrase of my friend from Ohio—that is propounded to him.

Now, I agree that emergencies and exigencies may arise when the public business might possibly be interrupted and broken down by saying that you would take no steps to punish Senators for refusing to vote upon important public questions. While therefore I admit that it is within the power of the Senate to punish a Senator for not voting when he is required to vote, I say it is a power that never has been exercised, and that never ought to be exercised except in some extreme public emergency, where it is impossible, after getting everybody present who is physically able to be present, to carry on the public business. With that limitation I think the Senator from Ohio laid down a very sound doctrine, and a doctrine I repeat which when a quorum is present has always been recognized in this body from the beginning of the Government to this day.

I say that, Mr. President, in view of what I had heard that it was supposed that the Senators who did not vote last night were endeavoring to resort to tactics of obstruction and seeking to defeat the measure in that way. I disclaim it for one. I think I can disclaim it for all, although I have no special authority. There has not been any conclave that I have known or heard of, where a comparison of views could be noted. It might be submitted to the next conclave that invents another resolution on this or some other subject on the other side of the Chamber for their consideration.

So much for that. Having said that I do not intend for one to take any responsibility in respect of saying "yes" or "no" to this abstract half proposition which on one interpretation of it I would vote for cheerfully, and which on another interpretation of it by way of implication I would vote against; and I do not see the necessity at this present time of making haste to make a declaration upon this important subject unless you make one, as I endeavored to have the Senate do yesterday without any success, that is comprehensive and undertakes to cover the subject.

What gain are you to make, Mr. President, suppose this resolution had been passed through both Houses now? It is a resolution which undertakes to declare rights, and there is carefully excluded from it the usual statement that it is the expression of an opinion, but it purports to be—whether correctly or not is another question—the declaration of a fact, the settlement of a question of right. How are you going to settle the question of the right of the President of the Senate in his constitutional character under this clause of the Constitution to which we are referring, by a concurrent resolution of the two Houses? Does that make law? It does in a mob; it does with a revolutionary party that may be determined to seize power and to centralize it at all hazards in two bodies of men that happen to be assembled at the national Capitol; but when you look it in the face it would be a little difficult for the Senator in charge of this resolution or anybody else to say that you could produce any legal effect by any declaration of the two Houses of Congress upon the right of another person or officer under the Constitution of the United States to do or not to do this thing. Suppose you were to reverse the resolution, and make it declare that it was not only the right but the duty of the officer named in the Constitution, the President of the Senate, to determine upon the opening and computation of these votes which were legal votes and which were not, and suppose the President of the Senate should think otherwise, what could be done about it? What force has it; whom does it bind? I should be glad to know.

You can by your rules say that the conduct of particular Senators or all Senators—of course it would have to be equal—shall be so and so, and that if the Senators affected by that arrange their conduct in a different way, you proceed to punish them or censure them, or whatever it may be. You have the power to expel them for misbehavior. But where do you get the power to expel the President of the Senate of the United States when he happens to be the Vice-President under the Constitution? Suppose you were to declare, as I said a moment ago, that it was the right and the duty of the President of the Senate, he being now the Vice-President of the United States and by the Constitution and not by any will or power of ours the president of this body, to decide whether or not the vote of Georgia shall be counted as an effective element in this presidential election; and suppose when the day comes, that resolution having passed, the President of the Senate, over whose conduct when that edict is measured by the Constitution we have no control at all, should say "it is not my right, it is not my duty to decide whether the vote of Georgia is a legal vote or is not a legal vote," what are you going to do? What measures are you going to take to render your declaration effective? Is it not a mere brutum fulmen? Can it be followed by any legal consequences or any consequences of fact even in the history of the proceeding? I take it not, clearly. And if it would be true put in that way, it is equally true put in the negative, that the President of the Senate has no right to determine whether the vote of the State of Georgia is legal or illegal. You have not taken a single step in advance. If the resolution is put in the form in which all such resolutions hitherto have been, as an opinion of one or both Houses, it has the weight and force of an opinion; but when you put it in the form of an edict as this literally is—whether it will bear that legal construction I do not know—the case is different. As I said the usual expression of opinion of the Senate and the House of Representatives is, I assume carefully, excluded from it. When you put it in the form of an opinion it goes as an opinion; when you put it in the form of an edict the Constitution says that you shall not pass any edicts that shall have any effect until those edicts are submitted to another representative of the people in a free government and another representative of the States in a free government for his approval. You do not propose to do it.

Therefore, Mr. President, as an edict, taking this thing literally, however true it may be stripped of all implications and negatives pregnant, it is absolutely void. As an opinion if it were expressed with any considerable unanimity it undoubtedly would have great weight and would commend itself to the judgment of anybody whom it affected; but as a command having the force of law compelling obedience, as laws only can compel obedience by punishment for an infraction of them, it is an absolutely void act.

But, as I said, I have had no disposition to delay the action of the Senate on this resolution further than was necessary to bring its various points to the attention of the Senate, and to endeavor, if we were to express any opinion about this business at all, to express one that would cover the subject. I believe now I am done with it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the Senator from Ohio proceeds, the Chair craves leave to make one observation on the question of order that just now arose.

When the question came up, the first impression of the Chair was that the roll-call having been ordered and having begun, although no quorum was declared, nothing else was in order except the proceeding provided for in the rules in the case of the declaration of no quorum, and that the proceeding to a new roll-call was in fact but a continuance of the original proceeding into which no other business could be injected. But on reflection, the Chair is now clearly of the opinion that as the roll-call disclosed no quorum present when it was made, it also disclosed that the original submission of the question to the vote, and the whole call of the names being without a quorum was informal and inoperative, and therefore that after the call of the Senate had disclosed the need of a quorum the question was open to debate and to amendment or remarks or any other senatorial action as if the original roll-call had not taken place. Therefore the Senator from Vermont was in the exercise of his right as a Senator in proceeding to debate the question without asking any consent.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have refrained from discussing this question; I did so all day yesterday, except to make a few observations that did not occupy five minutes, I think, of the time of the Senate, and I was in hopes that I should not be called upon to say anything more about it and I would not now but for the speech which the Senator from Vermont has just delivered. I had provocation enough yesterday, if I had been disposed to go into a political discussion, to make some remarks, and I have provocation enough now; but I do not now intend to take up any considerable time of the Senate; I shall be very brief indeed.

Mr. President, I propose to go backward in reply to the points made by the Senator from Vermont. His first objection to this resolution is that he says it is an edict, and in the same sense he says as an edict it is absolutely void; it is brutum fulmen. Well, if that is true, then it can only be the expression of an opinion, the opinion of the Senate and the opinion of the House of Representatives, if the House concur in the opinion of the Senate. So, taking the Senator's own logic, this is nothing but the expression of the opinion of the two Houses upon this great constitutional question, and I understand him not to deny at all that it is competent for the two Houses to express their opinion upon a constitutional question. He could not deny that in the face of the history of this country or of the history of England.

Why, Mr. President, the established mode of procedure in Parliament was to bring in resolutions, declaratory resolutions, and when they had passed then to frame measures pursuant to those resolutions, and that was the custom in the Congress of the United States long after I first knew it. Who can forget the resolutions offered again and again and upon which the whole debate took place, almost before anything in the shape of a law was brought in? Who forgets Henry Clay's celebrated resolutions which resulted in the compromise act on the subject of the tariff and put an end to nullification? Who can forget his celebrated resolutions of 1850? Who can forget the whole history of congressional proceeding which shows on almost every page of it resolutions declaratory of principles without one single word of proposed legislation in them? It would be a new idea indeed that the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives could not express their opinion upon the Constitution of the United States by a resolution.

I am not at all afraid, Mr. President, that that point made by the Senator from Vermont will influence the minds of Senators here. This does not profess to be an edict, as the Senator says, and it is the sheerest refinement in the world, the merest hypercriticism to say so of this resolution. It is a declaration of the opinion of the Senate, and if the House shall concur in it, it is a declaration of the opinion of the House and it is nothing more, and it is just as much so as if it were said "it is the opinion of the Senate," and is also the opinion of the House if the House concur in it, that the President of the Senate has no right to decide upon these votes. That is all there is in it.

But there is another thing that troubles the Senator from Vermont, and for that, forsooth, he cannot vote either yea or nay; and that is he imagines that this resolution came from a caucus, as if his party never, never held a caucus. Why, sir, if we were to believe the newspapers, his party have held a caucus on this very resolution and decided to defeat it if they can. I do not say it is so, but it is in the newspapers to that effect; I do not pretend to say it is so; but to hear the Senator from Vermont talking about caucuses! Has he forgotten when a Senator from Ohio, then my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, brought from a caucus one of the most important measures that ever passed the Congress of the United States, the resumption act, and brought it into this Senate without ever consulting the democratic members of the Finance Committee at all, and put it through the very day on which it was laid on our tables and refused positively to explain the measure and to tell what it meant? Complaint is made that we do not say what we mean by this resolution. No explanation is necessary; but there was a great measure, a measure that might affect the fortunes of millions of men in this country, brought out of a caucus, matured in caucus and agreed upon in caucus, and if the rumors are correct, the chairman of the Finance Committee who had charge of that measure was compelled to swallow it against his will, and to advocate it against his will—brought into the Senate and passed through before sunset of the day on which it was laid on our tables and with the most positive refusal of the chairman who had it in charge to say what that bill meant.

Mr. President, I have heard some curious things about that. When the friends of the late chairman who passed that bill were advocating his claims to the Presidency last year the great argument in his favor was that he was the author of the resumption measure. I have heard that title disputed. I have heard it said that he was not the author; I have heard it said that it was crammed down his throat very much against his stomach; I have heard it said that the caucus overruled his objections to the measure and compelled him to bring it into the Senate and to advocate it and to pass it into a law, and that that same caucus decided that there should be no debate upon it on the part of those who advocated the measure. And yet the Senator from Vermont, who was here, the Senator from Vermont who was in the Chamber when that thing passed, the Senator from Vermont to whom the authorship of that measure I have heard in a large degree attributed, finds himself shocked at the idea of a democratic caucus!

But, Mr. President, enough of that. Now the Senator has been pleased to read some remarks that I made in 1871 when I declined to vote, when four of us declined to vote. Under what circumstances did we decline to vote? I believe there were but nine democrats on this floor then; I am not quite certain that there were that many. Night after night, when there were sixty-three republican Senators and only nine democrats, had we sat here and made by our votes a quorum when nearly one entire half of the republican Senators were in their beds. We got tired of it that night, away towards midnight, and we said we would not vote and we did not vote; that is, all of us did not. The Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] more law-abiding than my Irish friend Casserly and myself, did vote; and I do not know but that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] voted—I am not quite sure about that—but Brother Casserly and I did not vote. The reason was stated by me, and I shall never forget it, because the late Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Wilson) came around to me and said, "You were just right in what you have said," which was that we would not sit here night after night and away into the night, nine members of us, and make a quorum, when thirty republican Senators were in their beds. That was it. It was no intention to fillibuster; it was no disposition to resort to obstructive measures; it was no disposition whatever by irregular methods or irregular modes to stop the legislation of the Senate. It was a measure necessary for our own protection that we should not be made mere hewers of wood and drawers of water to keep a quorum in the Senate when one-half of the republican members and more were quietly sleeping in their beds.

Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont has been pleased to read some remarks that were made on that occasion, in which I said that you could not compel a Senator to vote, and the argument that I made that to bring up that question before the announcement of the vote would be to indefinitely postpone the announcement of the vote. What I said then was perfectly correct; it would be to indefinitely postpone it. But how stood the rule then? The rule then, sir, was as follows; it was Rule 16:

> When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present, each Senator called upon shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly, and without debate, his assent or dissent to the question.

And that was all of it. Under that rule I said you cannot interpose this question as to the dereliction of duty of a Senator between the roll-call and the announcement of the result; and I was right, perfectly right. But what has taken place since then? The Committee on Rules, and if I am not mistaken the Senator from Vermont was one of them, have seen fit to change that rule, and, as if to meet the very argument that I made on that occasion, they have put here Rule 17 in addition to the old Rule 16:

> When a Senator, being present and declining to vote when his name is called, shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and shall so assign them, the presiding officer shall thereupon submit the question to the Senate: "Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?" which shall be decided without debate.

And now, sir, comes this clause, put in, it seems, to answer the very argument which I made and which the Senator has read:

> And these proceedings shall be had after the roll shall have been called and before the result of the vote is announced.

There it is, sir. By rule of the Senate they knocked my argument to pieces, and if I am not mistaken my friend from Vermont was one of the framers of this new rule. In view of that, it does not do very well for him to read the argument I made in 1871, when there was no such rule here.

But, Mr. President, I do not want to take time, and I shall say no more.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, my learned friend from Ohio has, with his usual skill, a little missed the point of my remarks. I was not paying especial attention to the question of what the Senate could or could not do last night before the result of the roll-call was announced; I believe I said nothing about it last night; but the point that I was endeavoring to attract the attention of the Senate to was what the Senator from Ohio had said, and what he has now again justified when you weigh his remarks, that every Senator must be the judge for himself of the cause and occasion of his voting or declining to vote. That is it. Upon that the Senator spoke bravely and well, and he has not thought it necessary to withdraw any of the observations that he made upon that point. It was equally within the power of the Senate of the United States on the occasion to which he refers, if the rules were different then from what they are now—I do not know that they were, I assume as he says they were that they were—to punish him, as it is within the power of the Senate today to punish me if I do not vote, being required to do so, in the method provided by the rules, for not doing it. The rule declared then, as it does now and as it always has, that when the roll-call on a question submitted is going on, it shall be the duty of every Senator to respond "yes" or "no," without debate, to that question. That is what it says, just as the other rules of the Senate say that reports of committees shall come in at a certain time and that the unfinished business shall be taken up at a certain hour,—rules which every day we disregard and disobey, because the general body of the Senate is willing not to enforce them for that occasion. The same precisely applies to the question of voting. As I stated before, there is not a single day in the sessions of the Senate when Senators on both sides of the Chamber do not fail to respond to their names, being present when the roll is called; and although I do not doubt their power, for the very reason so well stated by the Senator from Ohio ten years ago, that every Senator "on his own responsibility to his constituents and his duty as a Senator he decides that question for himself," I should add, I think, as a proper limitation, that when the emergency arises which in the judgment of a majority of the Senate, having the power to decide if they have a quorum for the purpose of doing business, makes it necessary to punish a Senator for not doing his duty that the rules call upon him to do, they can punish him. The rule as it stands now only provides for the mere formality of calling upon a Senator to vote or to give his reasons for not voting and asking to be excused. Suppose the Senate does not excuse him, and suppose there is not a quorum, what then? Less than a quorum cannot punish a Senator; and if you have a quorum, as the Senator from Ohio so well said, the rules now do not provide and were not intended to provide for stopping the passage or disposition of a measure in order to try a question of contempt. You put the party in contempt and then you try him afterwards if you want to; but that is all simple enough and it is not necessary to take any time over it.

The honorable Senator from Ohio states that he and his fellow-Senators of the democratic party declined to vote on the occasion referred to in 1871 because there were a great many republicans who were not present, as if the question of the duty of obeying the rules depended upon the number of persons who constituted the opposite party. I doubt if that doctrine will hold on a careful consideration, but I do not wish to take time to discuss that; but he vindicates what he then did upon a ground that is precisely the ground that he stated before and that I state now, with the limitations I have affixed to it, that in the opinion of the Senators not voting they were justified in withholding their votes for one reason or another which might be good for one Senator and might not be good for another Senator; he might have another and a better reason for himself.

The Senator from Ohio now says that it was away into the night that this thing occurred; that everybody was worn out, and that it was time for all the small boys to go home. Why, Mr. President, after all this matter had occurred and a considerable quantity of other proceedings had taken place about getting a quorum present, it was only twenty minutes after eleven, as the record shows, when the Senate adjourned on that occasion,—much earlier than most of us come home from the festivities to which I suppose at this season of the year many Senators are invited; and could we not give the same number of hours in the evening to our beloved country that we give to our friends in their parlors and refreshment rooms? I think, Mr. President, in the language of a distinguished statesman, "that won't do."

But my friend says that this unrecognized and illegitimate child of a caucus has had, if not a paternity, a precedent in what he understands to be the action of some caucus of other people. Let me tell my distinguished friend that so far as I understood him in what he said, he was greatly mistaken. I do not know whether like my friend from Illinois, not now in his chair, I am in sufficiently good standing in any healthy political organization to be invited to its caucus, but I will say that I have never heard of any caucus except the democratic one, so called, on the subject of this resolution, and I will say that I had entirely forgotten until I saw it stated in the papers a day or two ago as the result of a democratic caucus, that there was any such resolution in existence, if, indeed, I ever knew of it at all.

Then my friend says that the resumption bill of the year 1875 was brought from a republican caucus by an unwilling member of it into this Senate and forced upon the Senate without consideration by any committee.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not make that assertion positively, as if I knew it. I only said that it was so reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I understand the Senator to say. There is no misunderstanding between us.

Mr. President, if the Senator would apply his usual industry to reading the Journals of the Senate, I think he would see—though I have not looked it up, but that is my recollection—that the resumption act of 1875 was reported from the Committee on Finance of this body by its chairman in the regular way.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not deny that. What I said, and what I charged at the time, and what was not denied, was that the bill was not made in the Finance Committee, but was made in caucus, and the Finance Committee was merely the means used to bring it into the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be said, whether true or false, of every bill nearly that passes through the scrutiny of this body; probably ninety-five in every hundred bills that the Senate acts upon are prepared in somebody's private room. They are then introduced, or sent to a committee, as I know is frequently the case with the Committee on the Judiciary, without being introduced here in the first place, introduced and sent to that committee, or laid before the committee without being introduced. That committee considers the bill under its sworn responsibility as the organ and agent of this body. It reports, with assent, and with dissent, if there be a minority, its judgment and opinion upon the bill.

The resumption bill of 1875 came through regular channel in the regular way; every member of the Committee on Finance had the opportunity—whether he exerted it or not I do not know—to say "yes" or "no" to that bill in the committee.

Mr. THURMAN. If my information is correct, the Senator is entirely wrong; but the Senator from Delaware can answer for himself whether he ever had any knowledge of it or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it will turn out—perhaps I am mistaken—that the bill referred to was reported from the Committee on Finance to the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not deny that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then so far as caucuses are concerned, I am not quite able to see what the relevancy of the observations of the Senator from Ohio is.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Ohio has referred to the fact that I was the only member of the democratic party upon the Committee on Finance at the time of the report of that bill, and he was quite correct in saying that I knew nothing of that bill having been brought into the committee. I knew nothing of its having been reported from the committee or considered in committee until it came here to the Senate as from that committee. I do not say that I could have been in that committee-room at every moment of its sessions; but I say this, that I was and am a very diligent member in my attendance upon the sessions of the committee, and at no time during my attendance, or to my knowledge, was that bill in the committee or considered there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, that is another question. I was not then and am not now a member of the Committee on Finance. I do not know whether the method of proceeding of that committee was fair in that case or not. I never heard it impugned before. If it were not fair, it does not touch the question that we are now discussing. The bill came from the committee; it came in the regular order; whether that committee did its duty toward all of its members or not I have no means of knowing except the presumption in favor of the fairness of committees and the statement of the Senator from Delaware.

I am so sure that I am right as to what the Journal of the Senate shows that I will not take up the time of the Senate in waiting until I can get the book. I am sure it does show—and if it turns out that I am mistaken I will take pleasure in correcting it when I so ascertain afterwards, so as not to delay the business now—that that bill was reported in the regular way, that it went over one day, and was then taken up and was considered and observations were made upon it, and it passed to the great benefit of the country and in spite of the resistance of the democratic party, as is usually the case.

Now this resolution, on a subject that everybody agrees is one of the gravest interest and importance, not only does not come from any committee, but a party majority of this body upon yea and nay votes refuse to send it to any committee. It comes direct from that troubled fountain to which reference has been made.

But my friend from Ohio says that the observations I made on the absolute want of validity in this resolution as an edict, as a law, as a thing that is to command or oblige anybody to do or omit anything, are mistaken, because he says that it has always been the practice of the Senate, (and he refers to many famous resolutions and debates to prove, which he need not have done) to express its opinion upon topics of public interest. So it has been; so it ought to be; so I hope it always will be. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that that is what this resolution is, the expression of an opinion or the proposed expression of an opinion upon the part of the two Houses of Congress; and if so, if it passes the Senate and does not pass the House, it will be just as good because it will be the expression of the opinion of the Senate, and I suppose we have a right to our opinion, even if the House of Representatives does not think the same way. But we can make it pretty clear whether this is designed to be an absolutely void edict, or whether it is designed to be such an expression of opinion as the Senator from Ohio speaks of by putting on an amendment which I will now offer, to insert after the word "That," the words "in the opinion of the Senate and House of Representatives."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, which will be reported by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In line 1, after the word "that," it is proposed to insert "in the opinion of the Senate and House of Representatives;" so as to read:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That in the opinion of the Senate and House of Representatives the President of the Senate is not invested by the Constitution of the United States with the right to count the votes of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States so as to determine what votes shall be received and counted or what votes shall be rejected.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not propose to discuss the amendment of the honorable Senator from Vermont, nor to consider the merits or demerits of the resolution before the Senate. The debate upon that I had hoped would close on yesterday, and I had said quite enough upon a former occasion to vindicate my vote to my own satisfaction.

It is almost impossible to exaggerate the importance to the people of this country of the proposition contained in the resolution. If that proposition shall be negatived and it shall be affirmed by the two Houses of Congress, and the affirmation accepted by the people of this country, that after a popular election shall be held in every State of the Union to decide into whose hands the executive power of this country shall pass, all of that proceeding and all of that voting has to be submitted to the will, the control, the decision of a single officer of the Government, who may be and in the history of the country has been deciding in his own case, that his counting and declaration shall make him the Chief Magistrate of the United States, it is difficult to state a proposition more fraught with consequences to the people of this country; and yet that is the question which the Senate is asked to consider by the resolution before it. I do not propose to discuss that now.

But, sir, this is the question before the Senate: whether the rules of this body are obligatory upon the members, whether they have any binding force, and whether they are in fact rules of proceeding subject to which our duties of legislation are to be conducted, or whether they are to be thrown off at the caprice of a moment, obeyed when convenient and contemned and despised when they bind us contrary to our passing emotions? Yesterday there was a vote called upon the final passage of this resolution. Fifty-odd Senators were in the Chamber; about twenty of those refused to vote at all. The rule upon the subject is plain and explicit:

16. When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present, each Senator when his name is called shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly, and without debate, his assent or dissent to the question; and in taking the yeas and nays upon any question the names of the Senators shall be called alphabetically.

Then rule 17:

When a Senator, being present and declining to vote when his name is called, shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and shall so assign them, the presiding officer shall thereupon submit the question to the Senate: "Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?" which shall be decided without debate. And these proceedings shall be had after the roll shall have been called and before the result of the vote is announced, and any further proceedings by the Senate in reference thereto shall be after such announcement.

Here is a clear rule amenable to the understanding of any man, essential for the prosecution of public business; and the question is, has this rule binding force, or is it legitimate and proper and orderly that a member of the Senate shall contumaciously refuse to vote when his name is called, break a quorum of the Senate, and prevent the prosecution of any public business? That is the broad and that is the important question.

The Senator from Vermont read from the record of a debate in 1871, that upon an occasion there to be found four Senators of the democratic party, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] Mr. Casserly, of California; the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] and Mr. BAYARD, of Delaware, had their names called because they had sat in their places mute, declining to vote, although present, and that thereby a quorum of the Senate could not be had. That was true so far as it went, but only so far. I think the Senator should have done me the justice to have gone further and read what did occur, what was my action in that case. I had then been a member of the Senate but little over one year and had not a very close acquaintance with the rules; I certainly had never had occasion to have this rule brought before me; but when the rule was read by me, and I saw that as a member of the Senate the question was whether I should obey or disobey, whether I should be subordinate or insubordinate, whether I should proceed in an orderly or a disorderly manner, I made no question nor hesitation. I read from page 1603 of the Congressional Globe, Forty-first Congress, third session, the debate, February 23, 1871. I had asked that I might be excused from voting when my name was called; I had been told by the presiding officer, that objection had been made, that my request came too late. Let me read:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the Senator from Delaware is too late to ask to be excused. The request must be made before the roll-call is commenced.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask, then, the ruling of the Chair on the subject. It is my desire, coming into this body, to abide by its rules. What they were I have an opportunity of knowing, or else I have an opportunity of leaving it. While I am here I propose to abide by the rules of the Senate, and should be exceedingly sorry if I thought any imputation to the contrary could properly be made. Therefore, I ask for the ruling of the Chair in this case, as I do not desire to vote for this motion and do not care to vote against it particularly. I ask the Chair for information, that I may be guided by his ruling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the sixteenth rule, which reads as follows:

"When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present, each Senator called upon shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly, and without debate, his assent or dissent to the question."

At the request of the Senator from Delaware, the Chair rules that it is his duty to answer.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Chair rule that I am too late to ask to be excused?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. From that decision I respectfully appeal.

Then the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] interposed:

Mr. HAMLIN. If the Senator will allow me a suggestion, he now presents precisely the same point which the Senator from Ohio presented a few moments since, of interjecting another question while the Senate is dividing. I agreed with the Senator from Ohio in the point he took then, and I certainly shall hold to it now. The Senator will see that he is raising precisely the point which the Senator from Ohio a few minutes ago suggested, that we could not raise any other question while the Senate were dividing. That is good parliamentary law.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the honorable Senator accept the logic of the Senator from Ohio on that subject?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do, undoubtedly.

Mr. THURMAN. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

The point of order was overruled.

Mr. HAMLIN. And allow me to say that that is in accordance with the uniform practice of the Senate always.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They understand it perfectly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the names of the Senators who did not answer.

Mr. THURMAN. If that is the case, then the Senator from Delaware, undoubtedly, had a right to ask to be excused when called, as he could when his name was called the first time.

The Chief Clerk again called the name of Mr. BAYARD.

Mr. BAYARD. I vote "nay."

I merely complete the record to show that it was an unjust imputation to suppose that I could remain a member of this body and deliberately violate its rules. I said then, and I say now, that having had the opportunity to know what those rules are, if I do not like them I can leave the Senate; that is my privilege; but if I stay here I hold that I am bound in conscience and in honor and in a sense of public duty to obey the rules of this body; and that is my doctrine as applied to every member of the Senate. If our rules are faulty, amend them; they may be the subject of discussion and difference of opinion; but in regard to this rule there can be none.

In the case of 1871, as the honorable Senator from Ohio has well explained, we had been kept here night after night. The opposition, as it was then called in this body, consisted of one-tenth of its members; we had not enough to call the yeas and nays. We had been kept here while nearly one-half the Senate were in their beds or enjoying themselves elsewhere; we were compelled to sit here night and day; and this very question arose somewhere in the early hours of the morning; but that does not affect the principle. When the rule was read to me I bowed to it in self-subordination as well as in subordination to the rule itself; and so I hold it to be the duty of order, the duty of decorum, the duty of a Senator, that the rules of this body should be preserved inviolate, and for that I accept no other man's reasoning than my own; upon my own reasoning I stand.

More than that, sir, there was no suggestion in 1871 that we had silenced the voice of Senators on the other side by pairing with them. Pairing is an honorable engagement, personal to those who make it. It is not known to the rules of this body; it is not mentioned in the text of those rules; and it has no other force than the sense of an honorable obligation. It is intended to allow the balance of opinion to be preserved in the absence of the parties to the agreement; that is all. It never could be intended, it never would be made, if it were supposable that the withholding of the vote would obstruct the legislation of the country. There was no such thing as a pair in 1871. There was no voice or vote that the gentlemen of the republican party silenced by an honorable agreement with democrats at that time. But the case was different yesterday. Yesterday there were Senators on this floor willing and anxious to vote upon this subject to procure the passage of the resolution regularly, in an orderly and proper manner, but their lips were sealed. A padlock was on their mouths. Of what? Of an honorable obligation which was being perverted to an end that never was contemplated by those who entered into the pair.

Therefore, I say that feature was added to what I do consider a deliberate breach of the rules of this body yesterday, for which, if gentlemen can find excuse, they may make it; to me there is none. The rule that I lay down to them is the rule that I laid down and followed for myself, and which I propose to continue to follow, and that is that when I see a rule of this body that constrains me to a certain action, I will obey it or I will cease to be a member of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. Before the question is put on the amendment I would beg most respectfully to ask my friend from Vermont, if I may do so without giving offense, whether it will accord with his views to vote for the resolution if his amendment be adopted?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will answer that question by asking another, whether it will accord with the views of the Senator from Ohio to make this resolution what I understood him to intimate it was meant to be, a declaration of the opinion of the two bodies and not a coercive edict? I have stated what my views are about this resolution, that I believe in the principle it declares as far as it goes, with the construction that I put upon the words, and leaving off the implication which I think some people might make that does not appear in the phraseology of the resolution; but if it is to pass and is honestly to be what the argument of the Senator from Ohio demonstrated it must be, if it was anything, that is an expression of the opinion of these two bodies, then let us say so.

Mr. THURMAN. Every one will observe what a categorical answer the Senator makes to my question. I do not think the Senator means to answer me in that way; surely he does not. I asked the Senator, who of course does everything in perfect good faith, if his amendment were adopted would he vote for the resolution. He has asked me a question in return. I say to him, in answer to his question, that the resolution as it stands is precisely the same in its effect and in its meaning as it would be if his amendment were adopted; but if he will tell me that he will be satisfied with the resolution if his amendment be adopted, so that we may have the valuable support of his opinion and his vote, I shall vote for his amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be far better satisfied than I am now, Mr. President.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no more right than any other Senator on this floor to interpret the meaning of the language of the resolution. If this language shall be adopted by the two Houses, its meaning and significance will thereupon become a question of construction in the mind of every man who has to deal with it. Therefore my opinion in regard to it will have no more weight than the opinion of any other gentleman in the Senate, for I cannot add to the resolution or take from its meaning at all by any construction that I choose to place upon it. I have therefore abstained from making any further declaration in regard to the resolution than that which I made when I had the honor to bring it forward yesterday morning, when I said:

I will say, moreover, that the language in which the resolution is couched was intended to express the idea that the President of the Senate, whether he might be President pro tempore or whether he might be the Vice-President of the United States, is not invested by the Constitution with the authority to determine what votes shall be received and counted, or what votes shall be rejected; that that matter belongs to some other jurisdiction, some other power, which this resolution does not undertake to define.

So far as I am concerned that expresses the whole view of the resolution as I intended to frame it, and as yet I have heard no suggestion that the language of the resolution was inappropriate or insufficient to convey that distinct meaning.

I will say, further, that if I had designed the resolution to become a rule of the Senate I should not have made it a concurrent resolution for the action of the House, for the House has no right to participate in the adoption of any rules for the government of the Senate. Therefore the declaration not being in the form of an act of legislation, not being in the form of a bill or of a joint resolution, could not be more than an expression of opinion on the part of the Senate, in which the House would concur or non-concur as it might see proper. I hold to the doctrine, and I think I am entirely fortified by the uniform experience of the Senate in holding to that doctrine, that the Senate of the United States has a right to prescribe rules to its presiding officer. I find in Rule 42, and in various other instances, but in this instance perhaps more definitely and specifically stated, the very proposition which I now have in my mind:

All questions shall be put by the presiding officer of the Senate, and before a motion be debated it shall be seconded.

It is made the duty by a rule of the Senate of its presiding officer to put all questions, it makes no difference what the question may be so it is a parliamentary question, one that is within the purview of the right of any member to suggest; and if a second is obtained to that question then it becomes the subject-matter of debate under the rules which we have prescribed to the presiding officer of this body. It did not require the concurrence of the House to enable us to prescribe that rule to the President of the Senate, whether he be Vice-President or whether he is President pro tempore. Suppose that at any place or at any time when the Senate is in session the question arises whether the Vice-President, being there as President of the Senate, will present to the Senate a question as to whether a vote is to be counted or a vote is to be rejected. I would suppose that, as has occurred in frequent instances, the Houses have met, and upon an objection or a suggestion of difficulty having been made the Houses have separated, and the Senate has returned to its Chamber or has remained in its Chamber, as the case may be, a Senator rises and presents a question, the question that we now anticipate, for instance, "Shall the vote of Georgia," it having been ascertained that it would change the result, "be counted;" and the President of the Senate should say, "I refuse to put that question, because in my individual judgment the Senate has no power to compel me to put it. I decide that for myself, and no one else shall participate with me in a decision pro or con." In making such a declaration as that the President of the Senate would violate the forty-second rule, which requires that "all questions shall be put by the presiding officer of the Senate, and before a motion be debated it shall be seconded."

I repeat again, that if I had intended to make this a rule of the Senate, I should never have thought of asking the concurrence of the House, and passing the question beyond the pale of the Senate for the concurrence of the House (the question not having been put in the form of a joint resolution or a bill) cannot amount to anything more than a grave declaration of opinion, to which the President of the Senate, I dare say, would yield, or to which he might decline to yield, according to his own convictions of constitutional duty. In the event that he should decline to yield, then a question would arise between him and the Senate as to the manner in which he had executed the orders of the Senate; but I beg leave to say this, as my opinion: the President of the Senate has no right to refuse to execute any order of the Senate lawfully passed, in parliamentary session or in any session. I cannot conceive that a presiding officer of this body, though he may be the Vice-President of the United States, who has been assigned by the Constitution to the duty of presiding here, has power to refuse to execute the orders of the Senate any more than the Speaker of the House of Representatives has the power or the right to refuse to execute the orders of that body.

Senators more experienced than myself, better lawyers than I am, men whose minds are amply stored with all necessary rules of construction of language and laws, have expressed the unqualified opinion on the floor this morning that the legitimate meaning of the resolution as it now stands is that it is an expression of opinion on the part of both Houses. I have therefore no difficulty, so far as I am concerned personally, if the Senate will permit me to do so, in accepting the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered?

Mr. THURMAN. Before I vote on that question I wish to know of my friend from Alabama, who has this matter in charge, whether he desires that we should vote for the amendment? It will not make the least difference in the meaning of the resolution; but as he has charge of it, if he thinks we had better vote for it, as it does not change the resolution one particle in meaning or intendment, I shall vote for it.

Mr. MORGAN. I think it does not change the resolution at all. That is my impression about it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Let us hear the amendment read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "that," in the first line of the resolution, it is proposed to insert "in the opinion of the Senate and House of Representatives;" so that the resolution will read:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That, in the opinion of the Senate and House of Representatives, the President of the Senate is not invested by the Constitution of the United States with the right to count the votes of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States so as to determine what votes shall be received and counted or what votes shall be rejected.

Mr. THURMAN. If the yeas and nays have not been ordered, the Senator from Alabama has power to accept the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They have been ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the Senator from Alabama will not accept the amendment. I have no special objection to the amendment except I am satisfied that it emanates from that spirit which has prompted many of the amendments offered to this resolution. It comes from an enemy to the resolution. When I find a resolution of which I am in favor antagonized by those who are opposed to it, I regard it as one of my privileges to vote against all propositions that they may make. I am willing that any fair suggestion which emanates from any quarter as to improving the resolution shall be made; but when I know it is the purpose all the time to defeat it, and the amendment emanates from a quarter which is designed to defeat the resolution, I shall certainly not vote for it. Therefore I object to the Senator from Alabama accepting the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not assume the right to accept it. The yeas and nays having been demanded upon the amendment, of course I am cut off from the power to accept it. At the same time, I do not believe the adoption of the amendment would alter the sense of the resolution.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I should like to have the amendment reported again.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Oh, well, that is trifling, with due deference to whoever offered it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired to-day on all party questions with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] who has been called home by sickness, with the understanding that if my vote is necessary to make a quorum I can vote.

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I do not think the question involved by this amendment is political. I must say candidly I do not think there is any question in the amendment at all.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BAILEY. By an arrangement my pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] has been transferred to the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] and I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—28.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the resolution? upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend, to which I suppose there will be no objection, by adding at the end of the resolution the words:

And that it is the duty of Congress, without delay, to institute measures to secure the due and orderly performance of said duty in future.

Mr. President, I suppose there is no person in this country, unless it be a person who desires disorder and revolution, who does not agree that the disputed questions in reference to the mode of proceeding in determining the result of the vote for President and Vice-President ought if possible to be put at rest, and they ought to be put at rest in a time when no practical question of the result of a particular election is in dispute before the people. Some think that this can be done by the law-making power; others think that it can be done only by an amendment of the Constitution; but in either event, the measure which is to secure that result must be inaugurated in the first instance by Congress. It cannot be the purpose of the mover of the resolution, or of any person who proposes to vote for it, (among which number I am myself to be reckoned,) that we should continue the present doubt and uncertainty and anxiety to hang over the country at every future closely contested presidential election. If it is not possible in the brief period remaining of the present Congress to deal with the subject, and that a majority should agree on any practical measure, certainly we ought not to abandon the question without an emphatic declaration, and so far as we can pledge the two Houses of Congress an emphatic pledge, that the subject shall be immediately dealt with.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope that will be adopted.

Mr. GARLAND. I agree entirely with the amendment, and also with the remarks made by the Senator from Massachusetts. As one member of the committee, for the past two years I have been working very hard to accomplish what the amendment contemplates. I think it is one of the first duties that Congress owes to this country, to make provision for the orderly performance of that duty as specified and named in the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not think that it ought to be postponed, if possible, many days longer. I hope the Senator from Alabama who has charge of the main resolution will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. MORGAN. I also concur in the spirit and purpose of the amendment, and see no possible objection to its being adopted. On the contrary, I think it is in the line of the duty of Congress. I hope the Senate will concur in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. TELLER. We have on the Calendar two bills for this very purpose; one bill reported favorably from the select committee, by the chairman, [Mr. MORGAN,] and another bill, which is in substance the bill the Senate passed in the Forty-fifth Congress, reported adversely. They are both on the Calendar. If Senators will give attention to the Calendar, there will not be any trouble probably about getting one or the other bill before Congress, and out of it getting some kind of a bill that will be satisfactory. I do not suppose that the addition of these words to the resolution will change things very much, but I do not suppose there is any objection to the amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. The yeas and nays have not been ordered on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. THURMAN. But not on this amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, the yeas and nays have not been ordered on the amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. Then it is competent for the Senator from Alabama to accept the amendment, and I hope he will do so.

Mr. MORGAN. I have stated my willingness to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays having been ordered on the original resolutions, the Chair doubts the power of the Senator from Alabama to accept an amendment, and thus to modify his resolution.

Mr. THURMAN. Then let us have a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the resolution as amended, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) As I stated a few moments since, on this question I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] who has gone home in consequence of sickness, but I am paired with the understanding that I may vote if my vote is necessary to make a quorum.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KIRKWOOD, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I wish to withdraw my vote. I thought the question was upon the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. TELLER. On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALLACE. I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania.] I should have voted "yea," if he had been here.

Mr. COKE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. MAXEY] has been paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] on all these votes.

The result was announced—yeas 42, nay 1; as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

LAND IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

Mr. THURMAN. It will be recollected that the Indian allotment bill was postponed until to-day in order that the resolution which has just been passed might be considered. The postponement until to-day gives it no precedence, and as I suggested the postponement, (the Senator from Alabama moved it at my suggestion,) although I am not in favor of the bill, I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1773) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] wishes to have the pension appropriation bill taken up.

Mr. BOOTH. I ask that the pending order be laid aside informally in order to proceed with the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the payment of pensions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the regular order may be informally laid aside in order that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the pension appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question, as the Chair is informed by the Secretary, is upon a question of order raised by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to the reception of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS,] which the Chair had submitted to the Senate, and the Senate was debating the question of order when the bill passed from the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I believe I am entitled to the floor upon that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is entitled to the floor upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS,] but there is a question of order pending which is submitted to the Senate for its decision.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, at the time this bill was laid aside, I was attempting to discuss the proposition in regard to the power of the Commissioner of Pensions under the law as it now exists and intended to try to demonstrate to the Senate, if I could, that the proposition now proposed to be put on the pension appropriation bill does not afford the authority that the Commissioner claims that he desires, and that it will not effect the object that is proposed by the Senator who offers it. I do not know that I can satisfy any one in reference to these two points, but I have examined it very carefully and I am thoroughly satisfied that it will not advance either the interests of the pensioner or of the Government if the amendment should be adopted.

Prior to proceeding I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one thing, so that Senators may be notified that if any others shall take the same ground that I do, what perhaps they will be accused of in some of the newspapers of the country. I am not in the habit of calling the attention of the Senate to things that are said about me in the newspapers; that would take up too much time; but to this attack I do desire to call the attention of the Senate for a reason that I shall explain. In the New York Tribune of February 2, from a special correspondent in Washington City, I find the following language:

Mr. LOGAN distinguished himself to-day as the enemy of reform in the Pension Office and the superserviceable friend and representative of the Washington claim-agents' ring.

I should not notice that at this time were it not for one thing, which I will mention. I was not surprised at it. For years past it has been so common for some of the correspondents of the New York Tribune to make assaults upon me that I suppose it is about time now for a renewal of the attack. I presume this correspondent, by the card of some Senator, has the right to be on this floor, as I frequently see him in the seats here during the hours of business. I cannot here in this Chamber, with due propriety, properly characterize this false statement or the correspondent who wrote it, whose name I understand to be F. C. Bickford, and therefore must now content myself by saying that the author of this base falsehood is wanting in all the essentials that go to make up a gentleman. I make this enduring record for this person that he may have it for a reference hereafter; and I will say further that I desire to call the attention of the Senator who furnishes a card to such a person that he may take notice to whom he furnishes cards.

When the bill was last under discussion my attention was called, by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] to the array of figures that he brought to the attention of the Senate. I would not dispute with him in reference to his calculation, knowing how often he does figure for the benefit of the Senate, if it had not been for one very extraordinary statement that I find in his calculation, and I will call his attention to it so that he may explain how he arrives at the conclusion. The amount of arrears of pensions for the last year was $25,000,000, as I understand the Senator. Was it not? I ask the Senator.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I have not the figures now before me, but I presume he is correct. I will send and get the RECORD, however.

Mr. LOGAN. The first payment of pensioners was $8,821,826.09. "Arrears in pending claims"—now mark, this is what I desire to call his attention to—"arrears in pending claims, $192,000,847.50;" "annual pensions to 125,000 new pensioners, $284,185,000;" making in all $510,301,637.25. If that Senator with all his genius and power and knowledge in mathematics which he has demonstrated so frequently on this floor can satisfy the Senate how he arrived at the amount of arrears that are to be paid to pending claims now in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, I should like to know how he does it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Does the Senator wish an answer?

Mr. LOGAN. I do. I wish the gentleman to state how he arrives at that conclusion.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not know that I can state how I arrived at it exactly; but, in the first place, it will be understood—and I think the Senator understands it, for I stated it two or three times—this was an estimate, and that is all we can make of anything that is to come. We cannot state anything positively that has not already taken place, but this is an estimate. The Senator will notice that this is taken from the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions. The Commissioner of Pensions goes on to state the basis upon which he predicates his remarks and figures, and I quoted from him. I believe I took the identical figures. I will say to the Senator, as I understand, and the document shows, it came through the Secretary of the Interior to the Senate, and it was called for by a letter from myself, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to know what in his opinion would be the amount. It is an opinion only of course, but he appears to give facts that look reasonable, I will say to the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. That is exactly the reason why I called the Senator's attention to it. The presumption is that every Senator had read the estimate made by the Commissioner of Pensions, but the Senator got up here with slips of paper and read these figures off as though he had made the calculation, and any one reading his remarks will understand it as being remarks made by himself on his own figures.

However that may be, it is immaterial; but if the Senator relies on the Commissioner of Pensions, I should like to know from him or from any one else how the Commissioner of Pensions can make any calculation whatever upon the amount of pensions that are to be allowed from claims that have never been examined, for he says that these claims have not been examined?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will not interrupt the Senator unless it is agreeable to him.

Mr. LOGAN. It is perfectly agreeable. What I want is to get at the merits of this thing.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As I understand, the way the Commissioner of Pensions gets at these claims is, that he knows exactly how many are now pending; he estimates the number that will probably be rejected at 30 per cent. That is based, as I understand his letter, upon what has heretofore taken place. About one-third, in round numbers, of the whole claims that have been filed are rejected, and he deducts, as I understand, about one-third, and then estimates the 66⅔ per cent. or 70 per cent., whichever is left, and proportions it in proportion to those he has examined, and estimates then what it will cost. That is the way I understand it.

Now I want to say one word for the Commissioner of Pensions. The Commissioner of Pensions I believe is an honest, square, upright man. I believe he is trying to do his duty, and I am glad to say for him that I have seen nothing in him but what becomes an officer and a gentleman, and a man who understands the office as well as or better, in my opinion, than any man who has been in it since I have been in Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. That is all gratuitous. So far as I am concerned I have nothing to say, but I do have something to say in reference to those figures made and indorsed by Senators here to the country and in that indorsement trying to establish the proposition before the country that the arrears of pensions are over five hundred million dollars. Of that man I have naught to say at this point. If his estimate is so correct now, how is it that his estimate was $50,000,000 at the time the arrears-of-pensions act passed, and how is it that these estimates change so rapidly. You know from the examination of one of his reports right before you that he demonstrates the fact that by the examination he has made of suspected claims he has refused more than one-half.

Mr. BOOTH. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him one moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BOOTH. The impression has gone abroad, possibly through the speech of the Senator from West Virginia and the speech of the Senator from Kentucky on the free-ships resolution, that the amount to be paid for arrears of pensions is estimated at $510,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. That is exactly what I am calling the attention of the country to now.

Mr. BOOTH. But that is not the estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions. His estimate is that the amount of arrears to be paid to pensioners who get on the rolls through the arrearage act and the amount of annual pensions that these persons will receive during their probable expectation of life will amount to $510,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. Exactly. That is a very different proposition; and that is just what I was coming to. Two statements have been made on the floor of the Senate in order to alarm the country and the people in reference to pensions; and so it reads in the RECORD here to-day—and no man can read it without so understanding it—that the arrears of pensions are not the $510,000,000. That is exactly what I am controverting. I say it is not the fact. That is the reason why I called the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to it. Senators who are so prolific of figures on this floor, without any intention whatever of distorting the facts, but using figures in which they make such mistakes, go to the country and alarm the tax-payers of the country in reference to the persons who are drawing pensions from the Government. When I rose to defend the pensioners of this country the other day I was assailed by newspapers and persons because I desired to call the attention of the country to the fact that these statements were untrue and had no basis or justification at all.

Now let us go a little further with the statement of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator be kind enough to give me the date of the RECORD to which he refers, so that I can send for a copy?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; it is the RECORD containing the proceedings of February 1. I find by examining the figures of the Senator that he makes an estimate of the arrears of pensions at $560.15 per pensioner who is entitled to arrears of pension. In almost the next line, in order to make the amount $192,000,000, he estimates it at $1,025 per annum.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly I will allow the Senator.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The $560 is the actual payment of the pensioners now on the roll, not an estimate, the actual payment of the old pensioners.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Those already paid?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Those already paid; $560 is the amount, I think. I am speaking from recollection. The $1,025, if that is the amount which is estimated, which I think appears, is the estimate upon what is to come; in other words, new claims; and the Commissioner of Pensions estimates it from the new claims that he has examined; so that the new claims cost much more than the old ones.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because they run back further?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Because they go back, under the back pay.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to criticise what the Senator has said here, but it will not do for him to give that as an excuse. If the arrears of pensions running for fifteen years make the average pension $560, will he please inform me if it is running on two years more how it will increase to $1,025. That is an impossibility. If it ran three years or five years more, it would not do it. Eight dollars per month, $96 a year, which is more than the average pension that is paid to the common pensioner, will not double itself in a short length of time. If it is $560 now, at $96 per annum, it will take over five years to do it. These statements in the Senate Chamber as elsewhere are sometimes very loosely made and very damagingly made to men who ought not to be damaged by statements that are not correct.

I do not wish to pursue these figures further than to say that these estimates are not well founded. Now let us go a little further in this question. I perhaps during my remarks said that the law as it stands to-day was sufficient and gave sufficient authority to the Commissioner of Pensions to detect frauds. For that I was arraigned, and it was said I was in the interest of somebody other than the pensioners. Sir, my colleague and I represent more pensioners for disability in the late war than all the members from every Southern State put together. Why should I advocate a proposition to the injury of the pensioner unless I did it unwittingly?

But to carry out what I was saying, that justice was not done in the reports and in the statements that have gone to the country in reference to the poor people who are drawing pensions, and to show that there has been an attempt to cast suspicion upon every one of them, no matter where he resides or how much or how little pension he draws, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a paragraph in a letter written by the Commissioner of Pensions to a gentleman by the name of A. V. Rice, chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, House of Representatives, 1878. In one paragraph of this letter he says:

> The duties pertaining to the settlement of pension claims partake largely of a judicial nature. The officer who is charged with the duty of admitting or rejecting the claims must be convinced by the proof adduced either that the claim is just or that it is without merit, and the difficulty which is now experienced by the persons charged with the settlement of the claims which have accumulated and those which are now being filed is that they cannot bring themselves to believe the testimony which is offered.

Will any Senator in this Chamber accuse me of being unfair with this Commissioner of Pensions, when over his own signature he accuses, indirectly, every pensioner who applies to-day of being a dishonest man, and says the difficulty is that they cannot bring themselves to believe what is sworn in these cases. It is partially a judicial act on the part of these clerks and officers to examine and decide on pension cases. While it is partly a judicial act, and I agree to that, I ask how it is that a man sitting as a judge cannot be brought to believe the evidence, unless he has reason to disbelieve it?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator will allow me, he will observe a further statement in the letter of the Commissioner to the effect that very frequently in examining the evidence adduced in support of these claims it appears that the statements contained in the different affidavits are contradictory, and that the statements contained in the affidavits contradict the record as it appears in the War Department. The Senator will not seriously insist that the Commissioner of Pensions means to state, or does state in the extract which he has just read from his letter, that it is difficult for the clerks to bring themselves to believe the testimony in any case. The Commissioner of Pensions does not intend any such thing; but he refers in his letter, as the Senator observes, to the fact that all the testimony except the testimony derived from the records of the War Department is in the shape of ex parte affidavits; he speaks of the unsatisfactory nature of that evidence, and, as I have already remarked, refers to the contradictory statements in the affidavits. For that reason it is difficult for the clerks, who certainly perform a judicial function—they are judges—to bring themselves to believe these contradictory statements.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course I do not wish, outside of the record, to make accusations against any person, but when I take the record that they make for themselves I must take what they state. If the Commissioner of Pensions is unable to believe contradictory statements, that is very easily stated; but when he states, as he does here, that "the difficulty which is now experienced by the persons charged with the settlement of the claims which have accumulated and those which are now being filed is that they cannot bring themselves to believe the testimony which is offered," what does he mean? They cannot bring themselves to believe what testimony? Not the contradictory testimony; that is not what he says; but the claims which are filed and which are being filed cannot be believed by these clerks. They cannot bring themselves to believe. Why? It is too bad that these judicial gentlemen cannot bring themselves to believe some things that are said on behalf of these poor soldiers. I suppose if a man proves that his leg was shot off these judicial gentlemen would believe it if they should see the man with his leg off.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It would depend on where and under what circumstances the leg happened to be shot off. If it were shot off in a bar-room brawl, he would not be believed. He must have received it in the line of his duty.

Mr. LOGAN. But if a man proves that he lost his leg in the line of duty? There is another proposition: "in the line of his duty." There are quibbles in the Pension Office about what is the line of duty. Some people cannot bring themselves to believe that if a man is lying in camp he is not in the line of duty; they cannot bring themselves to believe that if he is ordered home he is in the line of duty. Some men actually think a man must be at the front firing at the enemy in order to be in the line of duty. A man is in the line of duty wherever he is under orders, and not disobeying orders, but in the Army. If he lost his leg, his arm, his eye, received a wound, or was disabled in the service, or contracted a disease while in the service, not in disobedience of orders, but performing lawful and proper duty, that man is entitled to a pension under the pension laws.

If a man proves by the record in the War Department that he was a soldier; that he was in battle or that without being in battle he received an injury or contracted a disease that is the first proposition, that is sufficient. Then the question comes as to proof. The evidence comes to prove these facts, and then this man says that his judges or clerks cannot bring themselves to believe, what? Any of the evidence? That is not his statement. They cannot bring themselves to believe the proof in the office. If the proof is unworthy of belief, of course it ought to be discarded, but when the wholesale statement is made that the proof cannot be made merely because it is made in behalf of a soldier, then the distinction is made. Proofs are made in the Senate Chamber. But recently a claim was passed through the Senate on ex parte statement. Why? Because the Senators believed the facts; because the Senators believed the evidence. Why? The first proposition being established, the other followed, and they believed it.

So it is in reference to a soldier. The first proposition being established that he was a soldier and in the line of his duty, then the mere question as to whether he was shot or contracted a disease can be proven by the record, if any exists, or by his comrades, by a physician, or by persons who know the fact; and to say that all this evidence cannot be believed is a broad statement that I think ought not to be made by any man who is a friend to the man who is decrepid and disabled and diseased on account of service to his country.

Right here I wish to call the attention of the Senate again to the intimations made in reference to the law not being competent authority for the purpose of making examinations in pension cases. The Commissioner of Pensions, in his report of the 30th of June, 1880, after speaking of the amounts, says:

> It will be observed that the rates at which the arrears have been adjusted in detail exceed the average of the estimate—

What average? The average that he made for the Senate and House of Representatives when the act was passed—> upon the whole 45,155 cases less than one cent and two mills on the dollar, which, under the circumstances of the adjustments, is an exceedingly slight difference.

> This result fully vindicates the plan adopted for rating the arrears, and speaks highly for the unprejudiced judgment and skill of the clerks who were employed upon that work, and particularly of Captain C. F. Sawyer, who has had charge of all matters touching the settlement of these cases.

Now, put the two statements of the Commissioner together. In one he says the evidence is such that they cannot bring themselves to believe it. In the next statement he follows it up. His last report to the Congress of the United States is that it is only one cent and a few mills over his estimate; and he is proud of it; he brags of it in his report, and calls attention to the fact of how well the officers have adjudicated these claims. I ask if there is any consistency in this; if there is any reason why these statements should be made in reference to the pension laws and the pensioners? for these are facts that he has recently stated.

Let me call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia, who has retired, because of course all the interest he has in this case is passed after he has made his speech, which was demonstrated to the country and to the Senate to be of no very great value so far as his figures are concerned; but I desire now to call the attention of the Senate to the present law, because the great objection made is that frauds cannot be detected. Let me read from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions himself made on the 30th of June, 1880, where he said:

> Out of an appropriation of $40,000 to pay the expenses of the clerks detailed to make the investigations only $26,466.19 was expended. The crowded condition of the office work rendered it inexpedient to detail the usual number of clerks for this duty, and the same conditions continue to be operative.
> During the last four years the investigations have been very thorough and made with great care, and so conducted as to furnish the pensioners and claimants, whose cases were under investigation, as ample opportunity as possible under the system for presenting to the office all the facts connected with their cases which might tend to clear them from the suspicion which had attached.

There the Commissioner of Pensions had $40,000 given to him for investigations. He says he has only expended $26,000 of it, and he says for four years these investigations have been thorough, and so thorough as to be satisfactory to the pension claimants and the Pension Office. If these investigations have been so thorough as to be satisfactory, I ask, then, what is the matter with the law under which these investigations were made? I desire to examine the law, which, as I have said before in the Senate, is ample for the purpose of making these investigations and for the purpose of doing justice both to the Government and the pensioner. There may be some amendments necessary, but that the whole system must be changed is entirely unnecessary. The proof proposed is an entire change of the system, for the proposition made by the Senator from Virginia is to repeal every section that gives any authority of examinations, any authority of testing the pensioner, any authority for examining pensioners, and substitutes a new and dissimilar mode for that purpose. In reference to Navy pensions of 1812 we find this to be the law:

> SEC. 4739. Before the name of any person is placed upon the pension-roll under the three preceding sections, proof shall be made, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, that the applicant is entitled to a pension under the provisions of the sections herein cited; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be stricken from the pension-roll the name of any person whenever it appears, by proof satisfactory, that such name was put upon such roll through false or fraudulent representations.

There the Secretary of the Interior has ample power to investigate every case known as the case of a pensioner of the war of 1812, and to strike any one from the roll. There it is not necessary to prove disease, it is not necessary to prove wound or disability, but merely the fact that the party was either a survivor of that war, having been a soldier in that war, or that the applicant was the widow of such a soldier. These facts being established, the law entitles the party to go upon the pension-roll; but the Secretary of the Interior has power under this law at any time to strike from the roll any person that has been put there either fraudulently or by mistake.

Now, what more power is desired in reference to pensioners of the war of 1812? The least suspicion would authorize an investigation. The least investigation would prove the fact as to whether the man was a soldier or not, and if he was not he would be stricken from the roll. There, then, is full power in that case. Now let us follow the subject up in reference to pensioners who served in the Union Army during the late war, or rebellion, as it is commonly called. Let us see now whether or not the Commissioner has ample power to investigate fraud. Section 4744 of the Revised Statutes provides:

The Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to detail from time to time clerks in his office to investigate suspected attempts at fraud on the Government through and by virtue of the provisions of the pension laws, and to aid in prosecuting any person so offending, with such additional compensation as is customary in cases of special service; and any person so detailed shall have the power to administer oaths and take affidavits in the course of any such investigation.

Now, I should like to ask what more power is desired, what more power is given in this new bill that is proposed for investigating frauds than this? He may detail any clerks, as many clerks as he pleases, and now, as I understand—whether correct or not I do not know, but it was stated in the speech of the Senator from Indiana the other day—there are some forty detailed at the present moment; but I should like to know what more power you can give to the Commissioner of Pensions to investigate fraud than to authorize him by law to send out and examine any pensioner on the roll at any place, at any time, whenever he chooses, and strike him from the roll or reduce his pension.

If I were engaged in deciding these cases, and the law gave me power to send anybody to investigate a claimant, to call any witness I desired, to swear that witness and examine him thoroughly, and then to decide whether the pensioner was on the roll fraudulently or not, and to dismiss him from the roll or reduce his pension, what more authority could any one demand?

Now, let me read again section 4746:

Every person who knowingly or willfully in any wise procures the making or presentation of any false or fraudulent affidavit concerning any claim for pension, or payment thereof, or pertaining to any other matter within the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Pensions, or who knowingly or willfully presents, or causes to be presented at any pension agency any power of attorney or other paper required as a voucher in drawing a pension, which paper bears a date subsequent to that on which it was actually signed or executed, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or by both.

Every person, whether attorney or claimant, who knowingly and willfully presents any fraudulent paper or any fraudulent affidavit connected with an application of a party for a pension or connected with his application for drawing the pension after the pension has been granted, is subject to a fine of $500 and imprisonment for three years, or both. That power is given to the Commissioner of Pensions to prosecute and to have indicted all such persons, to send out his clerks, to send out his special agents to ferret out such cases and go before a court and have the guilty parties tried and punished. How much broader could you make that law? If the punishment is not ample, amend it. Certainly the power is ample. The power to detect and the power to punish is ample. If the punishment is not ample make it more. What else can be wanted?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask the Senator from Illinois if he will not elaborate that point a little more as to the power to detect?

Mr. LOGAN. The power to detect under the law as it now exists is this: the Commissioner may call a clerk into requisition; he may call a surgeon into requisition; he may call a board of surgeons into requisition; he may compel the man to come and be examined; he can read and sift the evidence; he can call any witnesses he chooses; he can call as witnesses all the man's neighbors if he desires and swear them, and the power is given to the special agent to administer oaths.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Now, as to the power to detect originally, not to prevent frauds, but to detect who is a fraudulent pensioner when fraud has taken place, what power is in the possession of the Commissioner of Pensions now to ascertain that?

Mr. LOGAN. To do what?

Mr. BURNSIDE. If the Commissioner suspects there is anything wrong, of course he can send a man to investigate it.

Mr. LOGAN. Do you mean the case of persons already on the rolls?

Mr. BURNSIDE. A person on the rolls or a person trying to get on the rolls, either one.

Mr. LOGAN. I will give my view of it, at least. The power to detect a person improperly on the roll is this: if a pensioner is to-day drawing $8 a month or $100 a month—it is immaterial so far as the amount of pension is concerned—for any cause, it is not necessary, under this law, that the Commissioner shall even suspect the man. He may get up a suspicion of his own, without any arising from evidence; but the power is ample, full, and complete in the Commissioner of Pensions to send and have that man examined by a surgeon or by a board of surgeons, to see whether he is improperly on the rolls on account of disease or wounds. In the next place, he has power to send and have the witnesses re-examined before the special agent on a mere suspicion, to reswear them, to call all his neighbors and swear them, to swear any witness the agent pleases in order to offset the evidence in the Pension Office. All the power that could be asked to be conferred on a man for the purpose of detecting fraud is conferred on the Commissioner of Pensions now. There is hardly any power you can conceive of to detect frauds which he does not possess. You may change the mode and manner of exercising it, but it is ample now.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not think the Senator from Illinois understands my question. I want to know how suspicion can be raised in the mind of the Commissioner of Pensions. If the Senator will allow me to say a few words, probably he will understand what I mean.

There is a great aversion on the part of every fair man to giving information. I have had my attention called, and the Senator no doubt has had his attention called, to people who were "dead-beats," who were not entitled to pensions. I never write to the Commissioner of Pensions about such a case; but on two or three occasions I told the people to write the Commissioner. There is great aversion to giving information of that kind. If the Commissioner of Pensions had men identified with these communities who felt it to be their duty to see that honest soldiers were protected by the punishment of dishonest ones, there would be much more probability of the Commissioner of Pensions being able to do his duty by seeking out the fraudulent pensioners. I agree with the Senator from Illinois in the belief that there are very few dishonest pensioners; but I do not mean to say that is the only reason why I am in favor of this bill. There are other points I shall endeavor to talk about hereafter, but I desire to know how the original suspicion can come to the Commissioner of Pensions under the present law?

Mr. LOGAN. I will try to state to the Senator, if I can, how a suspicion can arise about an original application for a pension; but first let me state that when a man is on the pension-roll, the presumption of law is that he is rightfully there.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I agree with the Senator there perfectly.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, if the Commissioner of Pensions for any reason whatever suspects that a man is improperly on the pension-roll and ever desires an examination, he has all the power that law can give him to order it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. But we must assume that the Commissioner does not so desire, unless there is some reason for creating suspicion in his mind. How can that suspicion arise in his mind?

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer that. If there is no reason for having a suspicion in his mind, he ought not to have the suspicion. That is all.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Now how does the Senator answer this question? We all know that there are fraudulent pensions——

Mr. LOGAN. You may know it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Under the present system it is the duty of nobody where these men exist to inform on them. No one will do it; it is not the duty of anybody to do it.

Mr. LOGAN. If there is nobody to inform the Commissioner, and he does not know anything about it himself, and if you do not know anything about it and I do not know anything about it, what right have we to suspect a man where nobody knows anything?

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Government of the United States is suffering to that extent. We all know, I know, so does the Senator, that there are fraudulent pensions. I know that I have had to go to the Commissioner of Pensions when I have doubted the evidence, and have seen that things were regular where I knew they were trying to manufacture evidence.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as a knowledge of fraudulent pensions is concerned, I am perfectly willing that the Senator should speak for himself, but I am not willing that he shall speak for me. If the Senator knows of a fraudulent pensioner it is his duty to tell the Commissioner of Pensions and have the matter examined. I do not know of any, but if I did I should tell him. If we are honest in our desire to protect the Government, if we know of a fraudulent pensioner, we ought to give the information; if we do not know of it, we ought not to have suspicion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. If I knew it I would tell it, but I would not tell the Commissioner to examine a pensioner if somebody merely came and told me he was improperly on the roll, and the Senator would not do it either.

Mr. LOGAN. Why does the Senator say he and I know there are fraudulent pensioners? I do not know any such thing. There may be thousands of them; I do not pretend to say there are not; but to say that I know it is not the fact, for I do not know it. I do not know of any man who is a fraudulent pensioner.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I beg the pardon of the Senator from Illinois for saying that he knew there were fraudulent pensioners. I did not mean to say that; but he knows that there are fraudulent claims.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, very likely; but I know nothing about them.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Have you never gone far enough in pension papers in your own experience to know that there was a fraud?

Mr. LOGAN. I never have gone into pension papers. I merely refer them to the Commissioner of Pensions. I never applied for a pension for anybody, and have had nothing to do with it except to send the papers of applicants to the Pension Office.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not engage in that kind of business either, but I have gone over hundreds of pension papers to tell people whether they were entitled to pensions or not.

Mr. LOGAN. Did you present them?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I sent them to the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN. Did you try to get a pension when you did not believe it was right? That would be a very strange thing.

Mr. BURNSIDE. No; I never did.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not going to dispute with the Senator from Rhode Island about what he knows. I have nothing to say about that; but I do say in reply to what he has said that I do not know the fact of there being a pensioner who is on the rolls fraudulently. There may be thousands; I do not question the statement; but to say that I know it cannot be said.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I did not mean to say the Senator knew it. If I said that, it was under a misapprehension. I said the Senator no doubt knew of fraudulent claims being presented. I have not said that I supposed he knew there were fraudulent pensioners, because I do not know anything about what he knows. At any rate, if I said that, I desire to correct myself in that respect, because I did not mean to say it.

Mr. LOGAN. I know, however, and I know the Senator will agree with me, that there are many men who are to-day walking around and apparently as healthy as the Senator who are not able to perform manual labor.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I agree with the Senator fully in that.

Mr. LOGAN. There is not one of those men to-day, as unfortunate as such a man may be, with his scars covered, but what is suspected because he is walking around the streets, and people point at him and say "that is a pensioner." There is where much of this suspicion arises; there is much of it arises in the mind of the Commissioner of Pensions. That man never slept in the open air when the rain was pouring down in his face and slept on on account of the burdens of the day he had borne; that man never marched under the scorching and burning sun for the protection of his Government; that man never went through and across the streams, through swamps, and slept in marshes where disease was contracted, and for that reason he may readily invite suspicion of any man who apparently is not unsound.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator allow me to say just one word in the way of explanation?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator and I, I am satisfied, are traveling in precisely the same channel. I am for the amendment for a reason which I will not give now, but will after awhile. If it costs the Government $500,000 a year to establish a system by which these men can be placed above suspicion and separated from men who really deserve suspicion, I believe in spending that money.

Mr. LOGAN. So do I. But I am trying, and I think I will succeed before I get through, to demonstrate the fact that this proposition the Senator is going to vote for will do no such thing.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Then I shall not vote for it.

Mr. LOGAN. I will try to prove it at any rate. We were talking about suspicions. I know men who have been right here in this Senate Chamber, who served with us in this body, whose disease did not show itself, whom the Senator knows and so do I, were not competent to perform manual labor; and he knows and so do I that there are many thousands of just that kind of men in this country. People who see them ordinarily would think they were not entitled to pensions; but they really are broken down and diseased from their efforts during the war. These are the men who bring suspicion on themselves, because their appearance does not indicate that they are unsound or disabled.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Illinois let me ask him a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I am listening to the Senator from Illinois because I am aware that this is a subject of which he understands much and of which I understand little; and I would like him if he will to enlighten me upon this argument which I hear made. It is said that the Commissioner of Pensions and the Senator from Illinois and everybody else acquainted with the subject believe that there is a certain percentage, unfixed of course, of fraudulent claims and allowances in respect of pensions, that widows' claims and orphans' claims and other things are fictitiously conjured up and have succeeded, and that the claimants are borne on the pension-roll—who they are in the main nobody professes to know, but there is a belief that here is a large percentage of what I may call fraud. Now it is said that if that goes on, and there be no mode of ascertaining its truth or its falsehood, and of ascertaining if it be true who the fraudulent parties are, that will continue indefinitely and perpetually.

If the Senator will allow me to point my question to him by an illustration I will resort to this illustration: Here is a bank from which it is supposed bills are in circulation which are counterfeit and false bills. Nobody knows who holds those bills; nobody knows who has passed them; but information satisfies the board of directors that counterfeits on that bank are out. It is said that unless the bank takes some measures to trace these counterfeits and find out where they are, find out whether they exist, and if so to what extent and in what number, they will float perpetually, and cheat the public if they do not defraud the bank, and that therefore the bank ought to take pains, as the Senator from Rhode Island has said, not to rely upon some chance person who may come in and give information, but to employ agents to ascertain the fact. So now, coming back to this case, the argument is that Government should set in motion some sort of agency to find out, first, whether there is a fraudulent percentage of claims in the Department, and second, if so, who these claimants are. If the honorable Senator will do me the favor to tell me, as no doubt he can if it exists, how the present law supplies that need, and provides for that difficulty, I shall be very glad to hear it in this connection, as he is on that point.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state it if I can. As I was stating, the Commissioner of Pensions has power—I do not know whether the Senator from New York was listening to me or not——

Mr. CONKLING. Every word.

Mr. LOGAN. He has power to send an agent to examine everybody, to take testimony. Another power exists that I have not mentioned. The Commissioner of Pensions has authority under the law to establish a board of surgeons in every district, to order any or every pensioner before that board for examination, and he may at the same time send his special agent to re-examine a pensioner and reswear the witnesses. There is the power; not only may he appoint a surgeon in such county or town, but he may organize a board of three surgeons, and order every pensioner in that community before them for examination. There is the power.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Those surgeons could simply pass on the physical condition of the pensioner at the time he appeared before the board?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. They could not pass upon the question whether or not the disability was received in the line of his duty as a soldier, or whether or not his disability was occasioned by anything that occurred when he was a soldier, or whether or not he ever was a soldier at all.

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer the Senator very readily on that point. Will he please inform me how the board of surgeons that he proposes will know anything about the contracting of the disability?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. They can call witnesses for the purpose.

Mr. LOGAN. Exactly, and so can this board of surgeons under the present law.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do not so understand.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; the special agent, a clerk from the Department, can swear every neighbor the pensioner has got and every soldier.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. But we are talking about the board of surgeons now, not about the special agent.

Mr. LOGAN. How will your board of surgeons determine?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is not a board of surgeons.

Mr. LOGAN. How will the surgeons determine?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is a board composed of one lawyer and one surgeon.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; how will they determine?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. They will determine it, if they determine it all, not by ex parte evidence, but by examining and cross-examining witnesses that may be brought before them.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. The agent has a perfect right to do that now under the law as it exists.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I was not discussing the powers of the agent, but the powers of the board of surgeons.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; the agent may appear before the board of surgeons at the time they sit, and call every pensioner in the county, and re-examine all the witnesses.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is true.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the power. What more power do you give?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Now, let me ask the Senator from Illinois this question: Suppose this board of surgeons, as the law now exists, has the same capacity for examining witnesses that this lawyer and surgeon would have; suppose that the Commissioner of Pensions were to order in every district the board of surgeons to call before it every pensioner and make an examination of him, how much more would their expenses be under the present law than under the system proposed by the amendment?

Mr. LOGAN. I will discuss that system under the amendment when I come to it; but I will now say that the new system proposed will be very much more expensive.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It will be more expensive, I grant; but suppose it was necessary under the old law to do just what the Senator from Illinois has said could be done, then I would like to have him say, when he comes to that point, what the expense would be.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator pretend to say that the system he is trying to get established is not more expensive than the present one?

Mr. BURNSIDE. It is much more expensive.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly, it is much more expensive.

Mr. BURNSIDE. But it would not be more expensive than the present system would be if the present system was conducted as the Senator from Illinois suggests in order to detect frauds.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg pardon. The system that you are trying to get up—and I think I shall demonstrate it before I get through—is very much more expensive than the present system, if carried out as stated——

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask to whom is it more expensive—to the pensioner or to the public?

Mr. LOGAN. To both; to the pensioner and to the public.

Mr. BLAIR. To both?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; because under the present amendment you give the members of all these boards $3 a day, and I will venture the assertion that you cannot get the surgeon you describe in this amendment and the lawyer you describe with ten years' practice who is worth anything to examine witnesses before any court for less than $3,000 a year.

Mr. BLAIR. Has the Senator read the amendment?

Mr. LOGAN. I have.

Mr. BLAIR. Does it not provide that the compensation of both the lawyer and surgeon shall be in the form of fees?

Mr. LOGAN. I know it does; but I say you cannot get them. If you are trying to employ the character of men that you mention in the bill, you cannot do it for less than $3,000 a year. No man will undertake it for less than that. You give him $3 a day and fees, and those fees are paid partly by the pensioner and partly by the Government.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Does the Senator say these fees are to be paid by the pensioner?

Mr. LOGAN. Some expenses will have to be paid by the pensioner.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The bill provides distinctly that they are to be paid out of the Treasury.

Mr. LOGAN. I have read the bill. The bill provides that so much shall be paid for taking an affidavit, fifty cents. Now, then, who is to pay the man for going to the place where the affidavit is to be administered?

Mr. BURNSIDE. The bill provides for it to be paid.

Mr. LOGAN. How does it provide for it to be paid?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have it not before me.

Mr. LOGAN. The bill does not provide for expense of procuring witnesses on behalf of pensioners, or for their expenses while in attendance on the board.

But that is immaterial at present. We will get to that point before we get through. I ask you to tell me how is a poor soldier to get his witnesses to go before this little court that you are trying to establish? How is the old bowed-down woman, and how are the dependent children, and how is the old crippled pensioned soldier to get his witnesses before the board to swear in his case, unless he can pay them for going to its place of session?

Mr. BURNSIDE. That bill provides distinctly that the court shall go to them.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BURNSIDE. But, let me state another point. The Senator asked a question and I should like to finish the answer to it.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not asking the Senator a question.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I thought the Senator would like to be informed on this point.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir. I do not desire any information at present. Your bill provides that when a pensioner is so sick that he cannot go himself, the board or one member of it may go to his house if it is deemed desirable to do so.

Mr. BURNSIDE. That will do now.

Mr. LOGAN. You are very generous in that. I tell you, Mr. President, the earnestness with which some gentlemen fly at me every time that I talk about this bill shows their great interest in it. I will say that much for them; and I am glad they are interested in it if it is a good bill.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am very much interested in it.

Mr. LOGAN. I am glad they have become so in the last few days.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have always been.

Mr. LOGAN. I will not say the Senator has not been. But, sir, if you poke a pole into a fresh hornets' nest the hornets will swarm. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. That accounts for the pension agents sending out their circulars for petitions to come here.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me say to the Senator that it is not manly in any man to insinuate that because I am defending these men, I am induced to do so by pension agents.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have not insinuated that of the Senator; but he must not attack me. That is all I have to say.

Mr. LOGAN. I have not attacked the Senator.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I hope you will not.

Mr. LOGAN. What have I said? If the Senator is attacked by his own argument it is not my fault.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My argument will take care of itself.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no doubt of that; but the Senator ought to remain in a good humor.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am in perfectly good humor.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not the best evidence of good argument for a man to lose his temper.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have not lost mine.

Mr. LOGAN. To come back to the detection of fraud. The Senator says, how will you detect fraud when the soldier makes his application. He has to prove by the records of the Army that he was a soldier. If he claims to have been wounded, he must show by the record where he received his wound; he has to prove it either by the roll upon which he was mustered showing his disability, or by a certificate of a hospital surgeon, or by the certificate of the Surgeon-General that he is borne upon the Surgeon's roll as a wounded man. Not only that, but if his application is on the ground of disease contracted in the service, the roll must show that he was in a hospital, that he was treated by a surgeon in the Army; he must have the certificate of a surgeon, or his discharge must show that he was discharged for disability incurred in the service. If it fails in having that proof, what must he prove? He must prove by two of his comrades who were with him who know the fact that he was sick at a certain time and disabled at a certain time.

What more can the board that you propose do than that? If he can prove by two comrades that he was disabled or diseased at a certain time, and the other evidence furnished by him is sufficient, then he must prove by his family physician, who has attended him since the war, that the disease has continued from the time of its contraction up to the time of the application for the pension. All these facts have to be stated. All this proof has to be made. I ask how much more strict can you make it than it is under the present law? I propose to follow this by showing that the bill offered will not be better in this particular.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not care to interrupt the Senator on a question of that kind, nor do I mean to be understood that I am strongly in favor of the provisions of this bill without essential amendments, for I am not; but certainly the Senator would not mislead any one in regard to the force and effect of this bill. It does nowhere in any way undertake to keep in motion both sets of machinery, that now existing and the new one.

Mr. LOGAN. I have not said it does.

Mr. BLAIR. But it is merely to substitute for the existing machinery another law and another form or method of performing precisely the same thing.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course.

Mr. BLAIR. For the examining surgeon, as now appointed, it is proposed merely to substitute another who will discharge the same functions and in accordance with the existing law. That surgeon is to be one of the board in the future. He will make the same examinations; he will make them with the same frequency under the direct orders of the bureau as under existing law. The same things will be performed and by a surgeon in precisely the same way as now. The Senator talks all the while as though this bill undertook to confer additional power in some way. It does not assume to do any such thing.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is very much mistaken. I have assumed no such thing. I assume that all the power that is necessary is in the old law. That is what I assume.

Mr. BLAIR. And the new one proposes to in no way increase that power.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, then, what do you want with it?

Mr. BLAIR. The Commissioner thinks it is a better way of exercising the power.

Mr. LOGAN. He can change this any way he chooses.

Mr. BLAIR. That we propose to do in this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will understand that I have insisted that there is ample power in the law as it exists, and that you merely desire to change the machinery. I have said that all the time; but in the change of the machinery you do not better it; you only make it more expensive and cumbersome. That is what I say, and I insist on it. You make the same examination by the same character of surgeons and make it more expensive. That is your proposition.

Mr. BLAIR. Not at all. That is not the proposition; nor is that the force and effect of what the Senator is saying, if I can understand it. If this machinery is expensive, I am at a loss to see how it can be a burden to the pensioner, because the Government pays the expense in each case, proposes to pay the expense of these examinations under this bill. It pays the expense of the examinations under the existing law; and the Senator should remember that the provisions of this bill are with reference to the allowance of new cases rather than the re-examination of those which already exist, and the main object of this bill is by no manner of means the detection of frauds in cases which now are on the files of the Pension Office or in certificates which have been allowed, but solely or almost wholly with reference to the examination and proper allowance of pending cases.

Mr. LOGAN. I would not commit myself to it now, if I were the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. I shall or shall not precisely in accordance with my own judgment.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course.

Mr. BLAIR. It is certain to my mind, having read this bill, that very much of what the Senator says is entirely wide of the mark, scope, and purpose of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. That is a criticism that the Senator can make in a speech that he makes himself when he is entitled to the floor. But the Senator said that he could not understand me. I will only say that is not my fault. I have tried to make myself clear. Now when he says that what I said is wide of the mark, I tell him that he is mistaken. I have read the law just as it is and stated the facts just as they are. My statement in reference to the examination by surgeons and by special agents is exactly in accordance with the law as it now exists; and if any Senator says that I have not stated it correctly that Senator has misread the law, and that is not my fault.

Mr. BLAIR. If any Senator has done so, I have not done that. I have said this——

Mr. LOGAN. Then we will not discuss it.

Mr. BLAIR. I have said the Senator misapprehends the nature of the bill he is discussing, not the force of the law which he reads.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I am not discussing the bill at all. I have not touched it yet. I will show the Senator before I get through whether I misapprehend the bill he proposes or not. I have been discussing the present law. I think I have been very good-natured to my friends. I have let them make much more of my speech than I have made myself, and I propose to allow them to continue to do so, for if my side of this question is not sufficient to answer every argument as I go along that is presented to me, I do not want to be sustained. I say to them now that they can have an opportunity during my speech to stop me at any point and discuss this proposition. I give ample room and open the door to every Senator here to do it, for I want it understood before we get through who is right. I was just saying——

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Illinois yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. LOGAN. I certainly will.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) Before putting that motion the Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

JEANNETTE POLAR EXPEDITION.

The Secretary read the message of the President of the United States, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of the Navy recommending the dispatch of a vessel for the relief of the Jeannette polar expedition; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is the Indian severalty bill, being Senate bill No. 1773, which will be reported by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill (S. No. 1773) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill being before the Senate, the Senator from Rhode Island moves——

Mr. BURNSIDE. Now I modify my motion, and move that the Senate adjourn until Monday.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. The first motion in order by the rules is that the Senate adjourn until Monday.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. My colleague wants to go on to-morrow. I shall call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn to Monday if it is insisted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate do adjourn until Monday.

Mr. HARRIS. Pending that motion, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order. The Senator from Rhode Island proceeding strictly under the rule did not move that when the Senate adjourn it be to Monday next, but he moved that the Senate do now adjourn till Monday next. That motion is in order and no other motion can supersede it, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island states that that was his motion. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. INGALLS. I call for the reading of the forty-third rule.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand that a motion to adjourn has precedence of a motion to adjourn to a certain day. I should be glad to have the rule read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Rule 43 will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

43. When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn,
To adjourn to a day certain, or that, when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain——

Mr. INGALLS. Now read the conclusion—about the order of voting.

The SECRETARY. "Which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they stand arranged, and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to executive business, and to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under that rule the motion to adjourn takes precedence.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I made that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 30, noes 12; and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 4, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

J. HALE SYPHER.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report on the memorial and claim of J. Hale Sypher; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

STATEN ISLAND RAPID TRANSIT RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. KETCHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 6229, to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through certain lands of the United States in Richmond County, New York, and that the same be now considered in the House.

Mr. DUNN. I object and call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for reports from committees.

Mr. CONVERSE. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] will withdraw his objection to the request of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KETCHAM.]

Mr. DUNN. I will withdraw my objection in this case.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the right of way, not exceeding one hundred feet in width, through the lands of the United States now occupied by the United States Light-House Establishment in the village of New Brighton, county of Richmond, and State of New York, is hereby granted to the Staten Island Rapid Transit Railroad Company for the purpose of constructing a railroad: Provided, That the said right of way, and the width and location thereof, through said lands, and the regulations for operating said railroad within the limits of the same so as to prevent all danger to public property, shall be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury prior to any entry upon said lands or the commencement of the construction of said works.

SEC. 2. That the right of way, not exceeding one hundred feet in width, through the lands of the United States now occupied by certain fortifications known as Fort Richmond and Fort Wadsworth, and the inclosure or reservation surrounding said fortifications, in the town of Southfield, county of Richmond, and State of New York, is hereby granted to the Staten Island Rapid Transit Railroad Company for the purpose of constructing a railroad: Provided, That the said right of way, and the width and location thereof, through said lands, and the regulations for operating the said railroad within the same so as to prevent danger to public property, shall be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War prior to any entry upon said lands or the commencement of the construction of said works.

SEC. 3. That whenever said rights of way shall cease to be used for the purposes aforesaid, the same shall revert to the United States; and that the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act is reserved to Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that this bill is reported from the Committee on the Public Lands with certain amendments.

Mr. CONVERSE. I will state briefly the amendments. One is to strike out section 2 of the bill, relating to grounds now occupied for military purposes; and the other is to require a tunnel to be built through the lands of the United States occupied by the Light-House Establishment, and reducing the right of way from one hundred feet to thirty feet. The bill still leaves the matter subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury before anything can be done.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is the right reserved to Congress to repeal or amend this act?

Mr. CONVERSE. It is.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman says that this requires the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. As I heard it read it seemed to require only that the plan should be submitted to him, but does not require his approval.

Mr. CONVERSE. My recollection is that it requires the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. That portion of the bill will be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the said right of way, and the width and location thereof, through said lands, and the regulations for operating said railroad within the limits of the same so as to prevent all danger to public property, shall be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury prior to any entry upon said lands or the commencement of the construction of said works.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the same was brought before the House.

The question was taken upon the amendments reported from the Committee on the Public Lands, and they were severally agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KETCHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would like to ascertain from the Chair whether it is the design that members shall be recognized all round, and every one given an opportunity to take a bill from the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize as many gentlemen as the House by unanimous consent will permit; and he is recognizing gentlemen first on one side and then on the other.

GEORGE W. HENDERLITE.

Mr. RICHMOND. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House for present consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6034) for the relief of the personal representative of George W. Henderlite, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make such an allowance to George W. Henderlite, deceased, late collector of internal revenue for the eighth collection district of Virginia, as will make his net compensation equal to $2,500 per annum for the time he held the office of collector as aforesaid; and a sum sufficient to make payment of such allowance is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the personal representative of said George W. Henderlite, deceased.

Mr. COBB. I would like the gentleman in charge of this bill to state to the House its object.

Mr. DUNN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. As I understood, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] only desired information in regard to this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I call for the regular order without any condition and without reference to any particular bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins, and the committees will be called for reports.

Mr. COX. I move that the call of the committees for to-day be dispensed with.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. COX, there were—ayes 56, noes 39.

So (two-thirds not voting in the affirmative) the motion was not agreed to.

COSTS IN JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 7071) to provide for the adjustment of costs and expenses in certain judicial proceedings, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

The motion was agreed to.

SUITS BY STATES IN SUPREME COURT.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 6710) to authorize the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, respectively, to commence and prosecute suits against the United States in the Supreme Court of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN GRAHAM.

Mr. HURD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7107) for the relief of John Graham; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARIAN F. HAYNIE.

Mr. HARMER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7108) for the relief of Marian F. Haynie, widow of H. H. Haynie; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS FROM FIRE.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, presented a report (which was ordered to be printed and recommitted) to accompany a joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 221) authorizing the Architect of the Capitol to purchase such number of fire-extinguishing machines as may in his judgment be necessary to protect the Capitol buildings from damage by fire;

A bill (H. R. No. 1473) for more effectually protecting the public buildings, property, and records from destruction by fire;

A bill (H. R. No. 3985) to reduce the expenditures of the Government in lighting the public buildings of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4965) to provide for greater economy in the public expenditures of gas.

ANN LITTLE.

Mr. FIELD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7109) granting a pension to Ann Little; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MAXIM DRINKWATER.

Mr. FIELD also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of citizens of Bangor, Maine, for an increased pension to Maxim Drinkwater; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN TUTT.

Mr. RAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 6208) for the relief of Benjamin Tutt; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LUCY C. RAYMOND.

Mr. RAY also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 4932) to place on the pension rolls the name of Lucy C. Raymond; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PETER GRATTAN.

Mr. RAY also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1830) granting a pension to Peter Grattan, father of John L. Grattan, late second lieutenant Company G, Sixth Regiment United States Infantry; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN SCOTT.

Mr. RAY also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 5407) granting an increase of pension to John Scott; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MRS. SPEDIE B. EGGLESTON.

Mr. RAY also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 6177) granting a pension to Mrs. Spedie B. Eggleston; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HARRIET E. EDWARDS.

Mr. RAY also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7110) granting a pension to Harriet E. Edwards, widow of David S. Edwards, late surgeon in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

STEPHEN GARDNER.

Mr. RAY also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 3554) granting a pension to Stephen Gardner; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARGARET BEYMER.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 873) granting a pension to Margaret Beymer, of Chicago, Illinois; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 5450) granting a pension to William E. Ayres; which was ordered to be laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ANNA VOSHAGE.

Mr. MASON also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 133) granting a pension to Anna Voshage; which was ordered to lie on the table, and the accompanying report ordered ordered to be printed.

SARAH H. BRADFORD.

Mr. MASON also, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 1880) granting additional pension to Sarah H. Bradford; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LYDIA A. DRAKE.

Mr. MASON also, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 7001) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Lydia A. Drake; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

POLLY MORFORD.

Mr. MASON also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7116) granting a pension to Polly Morford; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM A. REID.

Mr. LINDSEY, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 1996) for the relief of William A. Reid; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 6717) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department; which, with the amendments and accompanying report, were ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1509) for the relief of Thomas K. Feogan; and also the petition of Elizabeth B. Higgins and others; which were ordered to lie on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON AND CHESAPEAKE RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. ALDRICH of Rhode Island, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 6955, a bill (H. R. No. 7117) authorizing the Washington and Chesapeake Railroad Company to extend its railroad into and within the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

INAUGURATION DAY.

Mr. SLEMONS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, by unanimous consent, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7118) declaring inauguration day a legal holiday in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Epidemic Diseases, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 7005) authorizing the President to appoint a commission to examine and report upon the adulteration of food, with amendments; which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed, and placed upon the House Calendar.

BOARD FOR TRIAL OF INCOMPETENT ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. SPARKS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 6957) to organize a board of Army officers for the trial of incompetent officers, with amendments; which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the House Calendar.

GOVERNMENT BUILDING, DETROIT, MICHIGAN.

Mr. NEWBERN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R.

No. 7119) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase a site and to enlarge the present Government building in the city of Detroit, Michigan, or for the purchase of a site and the erection of a Government building in said city; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COX. I call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the apportionment bill. I presume the gentleman from Tennessee desires to go on with the Private Calendar.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. COX. And I raise the question of consideration on the unfinished business coming over from yesterday.

The SPEAKER. To dispense on to-day with private business will require a two-thirds vote.

Mr. HASKELL. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. COX. The motion to dispense with private business to-day would require a two-thirds vote?

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has risen to a question of order. The gentleman from New York can move to dispense with the consideration of private business to-day, which would require a vote of two-thirds to sustain.

Mr. COX. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The first question would be on the motion to dispense with the private business to-day. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee would require only a majority vote.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from New York having raised the question of consideration, would not that be properly before the House for action?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would have to recognize the motion to dispense with the private business first, which requires a vote of two-thirds. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, as the Chair has stated, would require only a majority vote and is not subject to a question of consideration. It can be voted down—an equivalent result.

Mr. BLAND. Suppose the House refuses to go to the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the first motion that should be submitted under present circumstances would be the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] to dispense with the consideration of private business.

Mr. COX. I withdraw that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] rose to make a point of order.

Mr. HASKELL. I withdraw the point of order until after the vote is taken on the motion to dispense with private business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has withdrawn that motion, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT.]

Mr. HASKELL. If the gentleman from New York has withdrawn the motion to dispense with the consideration of private business, I raise the point of order that there is coming over from the Fridays that have preceded this certain unfinished business. The Committee of the Whole upon those days considered certain bills and reported them to the House. Pending the consideration of one of those bills in the House, the House adjourned, making it unfinished business. I submit now, Mr. Speaker, that the consideration of the unfinished business on that Friday takes precedence to-day of a motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of new business; and I ask that the conclusion of unfinished business be first had this morning, at the end of which I would be very glad to support the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of private business on the Calendar. But those bills reported from the Committee of the Whole during the past three weeks lie unacted upon, and they ought to be sent to the Senate for their consideration.

The SPEAKER. One of the bills referred to by the gentleman from Kansas technically comes over under the rules regulating unfinished business. The Chair is unwilling at this time to express an opinion as to the other bills alluded to by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL.]

Mr. HASKELL. Would they not come under the same category as the unfinished business of that day?

The SPEAKER. There can be but one bill pending as unfinished business coming over from that day.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to say for the information of the House that I do not propose to debate the bill coming over as unfinished business. I only ask for a vote, and an early conclusion of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that under the new rule unfinished business coming over from a former Friday comes up for consideration after the morning hour to-day.

Mr. COX. Then could I raise the question of consideration on the first of those bills?

Mr. BRIGHT. I wish to state that it was my intention to move the consideration of unfinished business preliminary to the House resolving itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar to-day.

Mr. HASKELL. If the gentleman will make that motion I will be glad to withdraw the point of order, if there is any doubt about that.

The SPEAKER. The practice of the House as to the other bills alluded to and reported from the Committee of the Whole has been different from what is suggested by the gentleman from Kansas. The practice in regard to bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on a Friday and not acted upon by the House on that day has been uniform during the experience of the present occupant of the chair to take them up after the Committee of the Whole rose the following Friday and reported other bills, precedence being given to bills and reports coming over from the previous Friday. But the gentleman from Kansas having raised the point of order that the bill the consideration of which had been entered upon on a former Friday is unfinished business, the Chair recognizes such bill as unfinished business, and decides that the bill is now in order after morning hour for reports. The Chair does not at present make a decision as to the other bills which have been reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRIGHT. I renew my motion that the House proceed now to the consideration of unfinished business reported from the Committee of the Whole on last private-bill day.

Mr. SPARKS. Is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee in effect calls the regular order; and the regular order would practically bring that unfinished business before the House.

Mr. SPARKS. It would bring before the House the one bill which was pending; but the gentleman's motion covers the others.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided as yet as to the others, and will not until occasion requires.

Mr. ATKINS. If the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee fails, would it then be in order for the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to submit his proposition?

The SPEAKER. It is in order for the gentleman from New York to raise the question of consideration on the bill which comes over as unfinished business.

Mr. COX. I do raise the question of consideration on that bill.

The SPEAKER. That would not dispense with the consideration of private business to-day, but would be merely a refusal to consider this bill.

Mr. PRICE. Would it not take a two-thirds vote to set aside the bill pending as unfinished business, this being private bill day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. PRICE. Rule XXVI provides that the consideration of private business shall not be set aside on Friday unless so determined by a two-thirds vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is adhering to that rule, and has adhered to it in all he has stated. But the gentleman from Iowa will observe there is this difference: this bill comes up as unfinished business, and the House may say it will not consider that particular private bill at this time, and yet be willing to consider other private bills.

Mr. PRICE. Of course.

Mr. HOUSE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOUSE. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business.

Mr. HOUSE. What is the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the title of the bill to be read.

Mr. HOUSE. Does the unfinished business include more than one bill?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 356) to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas.

The SPEAKER. Upon this bill the gentleman from New York raises the question of consideration.

Mr. TALBOTT. If the House refuses to consider this bill, would the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT,] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, then have precedence?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] demanded the regular order, and the Chair understands the gentleman is not resisting the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. TALBOTT. If the House refuses to consider this bill, what then?

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee to make the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair has ruled that the unfinished business, the bill, the title of which has been read, is now in order. The gentleman from New York raises the question of consideration on that particular bill.

The SPEAKER. He does.

Mr. HASKELL. Now, if the gentleman shall prevail in his motion he will not succeed by that, will he, in dispensing with the consideration of the rest of the private business of this day?

The SPEAKER. He will not without further action.

Mr. HASKELL. Then I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to not invidiously cut out one of these private bills, since he will gain nothing by that, but allow the whole batch of them to come up and be acted upon.

Mr. COX. I have nothing invidious about it.

Mr. HASKELL. I hope he will withdraw his motion, since he will gain nothing by it except to defeat action on one particular bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATKINS. The House was proceeding to vote upon the question of consideration, and the affirmative side of the vote had been taken. I submit that this debate is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. The Chair will again submit the question to the House, which is, Will the House now proceed to consider the bill (H. R. No. 356) to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, with amendments?

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 94, noes 57.

Before the result of this vote was announced—

Mr. ATKINS said: I call for tellers. It will do no good to consider this bill now, for it is not likely it will pass this Congress.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers, and there were 13 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of a quorum) tellers were not ordered.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

NEW YORK INDIAN LANDS IN KANSAS.

The SPEAKER. The House having decided to proceed with the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 356) to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas, it will now be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That those persons, being heads of families or single persons over twenty-one years of age, who have made settlement and improvement upon, and are bona fide claimants and occupants of, either in person or by tenant, the lands in Kansas which were allotted to certain New York Indians and for which certificates of allotment, dated the 14th day of September, 1860, for three hundred and twenty acres of land each, were issued to thirty-two of said Indians, shall be, and hereby are, authorized and permitted to enter and purchase at the proper land office, at any time within one year from the passage of this act, said lands so occupied by them, in tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, according to the Government surveys, at not less than the appraised value of the said tracts, as heretofore ascertained by the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the provisions of the act of February 19, 1873, entitled "An act to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas," payment to be made in three annual installments, one-third at date of entry, one-third at the end of one year from date of entry, and the balance in two years from date of entry, with interest on said amounts respectively from date of entry at 6 per cent. per annum; and the moneys arising from such sales shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, in trust for, and to be paid to, said Indians respectively to whom said certificates were issued, or to their heirs, upon satisfactory proof of their identity to the Secretary of the Interior, at any time within three years from the passage of this act; and in case such proof is not made within the time specified, then the proceeds of such sale, or so much thereof as shall not have been paid under the provisions of this act, shall become a part of the public moneys of the United States.

SEC. 2. That any lands not entered by such settlers, at the expiration of one year from the passage of this act, shall be offered, at public sale, in the usual manner, at not less than the appraised value, notice of said sale to be given by public advertisement of not less than thirty days, and any tract or tracts not then sold, together with such tracts as have heretofore been, or may hereafter be, entered, and wherein default has been made in the payment of any portion of the purchase money, or the interest thereon, as herein or heretofore provided, shall be thereafter subject to private entry at the appraised value of said tracts.

The first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was as follows:

In section 1 strike out the words "the appraised value of the said tracts, as heretofore ascertained by the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the provisions of the act of February 19, 1873, entitled 'An act to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas,'" and insert in lieu thereof the words "three dollars per acre;" so that it will read "at not less than three dollars per acre."

The next amendment was, in the same section, to strike out the word "three" and insert the word "five" before the words "years from the passage of this act."

The third amendment was, in section 2, to strike out the words "the appraised value" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "three dollars per acre;" so that it would read "at not less than three dollars per acre."

Mr. SCALES. The House was dividing on these amendments when the bill was under consideration last. I would like to inquire—if I can now have the privilege of explaining why the bill should not pass—I do not wish to violate any of the rules of the House——

The SPEAKER. Debate had not been closed on the bill; the previous question was not operating.

Mr. HASKELL. Debate was closed by common consent, and the House was dividing.

The SPEAKER. The previous question was not prevailing.

Mr. HASKELL. But the House was in the act of dividing at the time. If there is any doubt about it, I, having charge of the bill from the Committee on Indian Affairs, will now move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL,] having charge of the bill, indicates his purpose to move the previous question upon it.

Mr. SCALES. I simply desire to say——

Mr. HASKELL. I must object to debate. The bill was very thoroughly discussed the other day. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments, so that it may be voted up or down, and the House be permitted to proceed with other business.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. SCALES. Then I am not allowed to tell the House why this bill should not pass.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas, having charge of the bill, objects to debate.

Mr. ATKINS. I trust the gentleman from Kansas will not insist upon the previous question at this time. There are gentlemen present who did not hear the discussion the other day. I think it is due to the House that the bill should be explained before we are called upon to vote upon it.

Mr. HASKELL. I do not call the previous question from any desire of my own to cut off debate, but out of deference to the House that it may proceed with other business. For myself, I will agree that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] be allowed fifteen minutes, and I will take fifteen minutes in reply.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope that will be acceded to.

Mr. SCALES. I do not think I shall want more than ten minutes.

Mr. BRAGG. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRAGG. If a gentleman who has charge of a bill omits to move the previous question upon it, and another gentleman obtains the floor, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] did in this case, can the gentleman having charge of the bill then correct his error and move the previous question, so as to take the other gentleman off the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not consider that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] was taken off the floor in that way. He was taken off the floor because the House had to resume the exact condition it occupied at the time the bill was last under consideration.

Mr. BRAGG. Then why did the Speaker hold that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] had the right to move the previous question at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that the gentleman from Kansas having charge of the bill desired to move the previous question upon it, which he had the right to do when he obtained the floor. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] as entitled to the floor when the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] stated that the House was dividing upon the bill when it was last under consideration, and that he therefore objected to debate at this time. The gentleman from North Carolina will now be recognized by the Chair as entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes.

Mr. SCALES. If I can get the attention of the House I desire to state the facts of this case. I have no feeling on the subject; I have no prejudice to gratify. I desire to state the facts frankly and fairly, in order that justice may be done to the Indians as well as to the citizens of Kansas who seek the passage of this bill.

In the outset I will state that it comes here recommended by the majority of the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House. But it is opposed by a respectable minority of that committee, by the Secretary of the Interior, and by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I think that when I make a statement of the case, the House will conclude, as I have done, that this bill ought not to pass.

These citizens in Kansas have had possession of these New York Indian lands in that State for twenty years. They have paid no tax on those lands; they have not paid a dollar for them in any shape or form; and the Secretary of the Interior in a report to this House says that they have driven the Indians from the land. Scarcely an Indian can now be found in the State of Kansas; these Indians have been driven by the hostility of the whites from the lands given to them by the Government.

Under these circumstances these citizens went on to improve these lands to some extent. In order that full justice might be done to these settlers and the Indians, this Government sent out a commission to appraise the land that it might be sold at the appraised value and that the Indians might get what it is worth, and the citizen pay no more than this value.

Now this bill as it came from the committee proposes that the land be sold at the appraised value. My friend from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] offered in Committee of the Whole an amendment, which was adopted, fixing the valuation at $3 per acre.

A MEMBER. What is the appraised value?

Mr. SCALES. The appraised value is about five dollars an acre. These lands, as I understand from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, are situated in the richest county in the State of Kansas, in the neighborhood of Fort Scott.

Mr. BRIGHT. Has the Indian title ever been extinguished in any way?

Mr. SCALES. No, sir; it belongs to the Indians. As I have just stated the land is in one of the richest regions of the State; railroads now pass through it, and every acre, as we are informed, is worth at least five dollars.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am here simply to speak in behalf of the Indian who has no one else to speak for him. I am here to speak for him to-day against the wrong sought to be done by the white settler. I am here to ask this House to give the Indian what his land is worth, and not to sell it at an insufficient valuation to men who have gone on the land in their own wrong; who have occupied and cultivated it for twenty years, never paying a dollar of rent to the Indians, nor a dollar of taxes to the Government. The gentleman from Kansas comes here, and without any proof to support him, asks that the valuation of this land be reduced to $3 an acre, contrary to the action of the appraisers who fixed the value at $5 an acre.

This is all I have to say. I do think that under the circumstances of the case, the bill as reported by the committee should be sustained.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. Did the Indians leave there twenty years ago voluntarily or not?

Mr. SCALES. No, sir; the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs concur in the statement that the Indians were driven from those lands by hostilities.

Mr. ATKINS. Twenty years ago?

Mr. SCALES. Some twenty years ago, and some since—all along during that time.

Mr. HASKELL. Only in a few cases.

Mr. SCALES. That is what the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs report.

Mr. HASKELL. There is not one of the men on the land now who was there then.

Mr. VALENTINE. If the lands were unimproved would they be worth $5 an acre?

Mr. SCALES. I do not know how that may be. I know the officers of the Government give that as the valuation. I know that sworn appraisers have gone there and they decide that the lands are worth that price. If they be not worth so much, then I am willing in the interest of justice between the parties (if these settlers have any claim to justice under such circumstances) that this bill shall be voted down and other appraisers sent there to appraise the land.

Mr. SPARKS. These appraisers did not take into account the improvements?

Mr. SCALES. No, sir; just the land.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. How was this appraisement made?

Mr. SCALES. By appraisers appointed by the Government.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Then I understand it is proposed that the Government shall not give these Indians what the officers of the Government valued the lands at.

Mr. SCALES. That is the valuation made by Government appraisers; and now gentlemen here are not willing to pay the Indians this valuation, although as is known to every one who has had any experience in the settlement of these Indian matters such valuations are always made in the interest of the settler.

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope I may have the ear of the House for a few moments, because I have to make a statement of facts differing so radically from the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] that I am very frank to say if his statements were absolutely true, were absolutely matters of record, as he doubtless thinks they are, I like him would not consent to have these lands sold for less than the appraised value.

What are the facts in the case? Twenty-six years ago, by a treaty with the New York Indians, it was provided that an immense reservation in the State of Kansas should be set apart for their use and ownership, provided they would go upon the lands and occupy them. They utterly failed to go upon the lands; not a single tribe of those Indians went upon the lands.

A few straggling Indians from Michigan, Wisconsin, and New York, said to number thirty-two souls, went upon the lands and made selections or locations there. The tribes did not go. They did not avail themselves of the new reservation, and refused to leave the old. The Government declined to force them to go.

Now, Mr. Speaker, of these thirty-two isolated Indians who went upon the land no officer of this Government has ever been able to find fifteen of them. It was charged and proved that many of these locations said to be on file in the Indian Department were made by speculative white men for Indians who never existed.

Behind the question of title to these thirty-two selections lie an infinite number of questions which I am frank to say if they were carried into court would result in ousting the Indians from the claimed selections of these lands entirely. That was understood by the Indians themselves, and it was understood by white men, too.

This proceeding here, Mr. Speaker, is to avoid a long litigation in court. I say the Indians hold no title to those lands. All they hold are certificates of allotment. Nowhere in the statutes, nowhere in the treaty, is there any provision the Government should patent the lands. All they hold is the certificate of the Interior Department of these thirty-two allotments. They have no title whatever to them. That question has never been settled. I believe and the settlers believe that if the questions were taken into court for determination, whatever title they claim would be decided to be worthless.

Mr. STEVENSON. What were the conditions of the allotments?

Mr. HASKELL. That these tribes were to go upon this reservation and live there and make it their home.

Mr. ATKINS. How long were these lands to remain in their possession?

Mr. HASKELL. The treaty is silent on that point. They were to possess them and to make them their home. It is a large reservation; but they utterly failed to comply with that condition to live on the lands, and did not occupy them.

Mr. ATKINS. Do not the certificates amount to a perpetual possession if they remained on the land?

Mr. HASKELL. Yes, if they remained upon the land.

Mr. ATKINS. Have they been driven from the land by force?

Mr. HASKELL. Now to come to the question of force. They were never driven from those lands by force. There was no uprising against them. In the conflicts which always exist upon the border even among white men, there was an occasional squatter and an occasional Indian who came into conflict. Some of them were driven from the land. I have no doubt about that. This was twenty-six years ago. Quite a number of them staid there, and under the provisions of a law passed years ago every Indian who staid there was given the right to take his land and to own it and sell it.

Mr. ATKINS. Why were some of these Indians driven from the land?

Mr. HASKELL. I have just told you that occasionally a squatter would come into conflict with the Indian occupant, and in these struggles, which oftentimes occur between whites themselves, the Indians sometimes were driven off. I have no doubt about that.

But that, Mr. Speaker, was twenty-six years ago. Of all the original squatters upon these lands, if they did injustice to the Indians, not one of them remains there now. Every man upon the lands to-day is a man who has gone there and bought the lands from the occupants. One writes to me that he paid $4,000 for the improvements put upon those lands.

The Secretary of the Interior opposes this bill because he and the entire genius of the Department assume that western lands are worth a great deal more than they really are. Every western man will bear me out in that assertion. I sold a farm myself in one of the thickly settled counties of Kansas for $4.50 an acre; and some of these Indian lands are appraised as high as $10 an acre, high prairie land, which in my State can be bought for $2.50 an acre.

Again, there are about ten of these Indian allottees who banded together and hired an attorney, an ex-member of Congress who preceded me in my district, Stephen A. Cobb, of Wyandotte, sent him to Washington and asked him to secure the sale of these lands just as is provided for in this bill at $2.50 an acre. I saw their signatures to the paper, authorizing him as their attorney to come here and secure that sale if possible. They said the title is in doubt, and settlers will not buy at a high appraisement a doubtful title, and to compromise and settle the business they would take $2.50 an acre for the land.

Mr. BRIGHT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HASKELL. Certainly.

Mr. BRIGHT. What disposition is proposed to be made of the proceeds of the sales of these lands? I wish to know whether they go into the Treasury of the United States or inure to the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. HASKELL. The funds derived from the sale under this bill go to the Indians themselves. They are to be paid to the Indian representatives of the piece of land. More than this. The gentleman from North Carolina says that these lands pay no taxes. Why, under the laws of our State every furrow upon the prairies can be taxed as personal property; and the taxation upon this land, while not technically taxed upon the realty, is derived from a tax levied upon the personal property, upon the buildings, the barns, the fences, and other improvements on the lands, and aggregates about as much as a tax would be if levied upon the land itself. They are taxed just as heavily for the support of the local government as if the tax was laid upon the lands, and in fact heavier. It is said, Mr. Speaker, that this is a rich country; that these lands are very valuable; that this is a gigantic scheme to get possession of rich lands at very low prices, and that is alleged as the secret of this whole scheme.

Why, sir, I have been all over these lands myself, and I can say to this House that much of the land is high prairie land, which, all over my State, I can buy anywhere at $3 per acre.

There is no fraud whatever in it. When I came before the committee I came to present a bill that as many of the Indians as could be got together agreed to as well as the white settlers upon the lands. It was a compromise measure mutually acceptable to all parties. Now, the great difficulty is to get at the root of the question, to know how to dispose of the lands. They cannot be sold in open market at public auction, and why? Because they have to protect the holders of the improvements upon these lands to the same extent. When you sell the lands you sell the houses, and the hay-stacks, and the fences, and all of the improvements which these men for twenty-six years have been putting upon lands. Of course the Government will not go to work and oust a large number of settlers, and throw them out or force them to pay prices which would drive them out upon the prairies, prices which they could never pay, and virtually dispossess them in that manner. Some bill was therefore absolutely necessary to be devised in which all parties should be secured—the settler on the homestead, and the Indian—by paying to the Indian a fair price for his allotment. Now, the appraisement of these lands has been very unequal, but the average appraisement is only $5 per acre. I do not object so much to the appraisement myself as to the fact that the land is unequally appraised.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him if by his proposition to pay the Indians for these lands he does not virtually acknowledge their title thereto?

Mr. HASKELL. No, sir, I do not. I deny most emphatically their title.

Mr. McMILLIN. If they have no title, then why do you propose to pay them for the land?

Mr. HASKELL. Because there is a dispute about the title. Because there is no other way of settling it except by expensive litigation, and we believe it is better for all parties to compromise these suits than to get into a quarrel or fight the case in the courts, and by this method they can get $3 an acre without a dollar of costs, but if they go into the courts they may lose all. It is a liberal and fair transaction for all parties and there can be no possible objection to it, because the only persons who have a right to object to it have given their sanction to it and are anxious that this disposition shall be made of them.

I hold, Mr. Speaker, a letter in my hand from a Presbyterian clergyman from a little town in the district in which I live in which he states that a recent meeting of these men has been held, and that in his judgment the settlers will condemn me if I secure the passage of a bill allowing more than $2.50 an acre. I wrote back that according to my judgment these land questions ought to be settled in some way; the difference between $2.50 and $3 an acre was not great; and that I believed Congress would agree to pass a bill allowing $3, and I am here urging this bill not in the interest of any political work, not in the interest of any job, but merely to settle an old question that has been unsettled for the last twenty-six years. I ask this House to support me in a bill in which all of these parties have united and which is supported by nine members of the committee.

Now, referring to that letter of the Secretary of the Interior to which reference has been made here, in many of its assertions the gentleman from North Carolina ought to recollect that that letter was written not about this bill, but another one not now before the House. There is where the letter of the Secretary of the Interior misleads the House to a great extent. That letter was written, as I have stated, concerning a totally different bill, while this bill as the committee have reported it has never been before the Secretary of the Interior at all. I never made an argument before him on the basis of the committee report.

Mr. WILSON. Is the Commissioner of Indian Affairs opposed to this bill?

Mr. HASKELL. The old Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Hayt, was opposed to it, because, I am sorry to say, he was opposed to everything that looked to the settlement of anything.

Mr. PRESCOTT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HASKELL. I have only a moment, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I find by the report of the committee that the lands were appraised at from $3.75 to $10 per acre. I find by the report of the Secretary that a portion of these settlers have already settled their claims at the appraised value of the lands, and under the report of the commissioners it appears that at least eight of these divisions of thirty-two have been so settled, and some at the highest price of the appraisement. The bill as now presented makes no exception in regard to those persons. The question I desire to ask the gentleman from Kansas is, if the bill is passed in its present form, will not these parties have the right to come in and get paid for their lands at $3 per acre, who have already settled at $6 or $6.50, and thus have the Government to refund the difference or have it taken from the Indians?

Mr. HASKELL. Not at all. Those allotments were bought and paid for under law, and to those settlers that was concluded; the whole question was res adjudicata. They have the patent to their lands, and the allottee, the man bought of, has his money. It is not in the hands of the Government to give back. It is not a governmental question. The white man has his land under patent from the Government and by quitclaim deed from the Indian, or has his money; and so far as these parties are concerned it is not in contemplation to do anything.

Mr. PRESCOTT. The bill says:

That those persons, being heads of families or single persons over twenty-one years of age, who have made settlement and improvement upon, and are bona fide claimants and occupants of, either in person or by tenant, the lands in Kansas which were allotted to certain New York Indians, and for which certificates of allotment, dated the 14th day of September, 1860, for three hundred and twenty acres of land each, were issued to thirty-two of said Indians, &c.

That covers the whole land. There should be an amendment added as to those who have not heretofore settled for the lands at their appraised value under the acts of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] has expired. The gentleman from North Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCALES. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. HOOKER. I desire the Clerk to read the paragraphs I have marked in article 2 of the treaty made with the New York Indians.

The Clerk read as follows:

To have and to hold the same in fee-simple to the said tribes or nations of Indians, by patent from the President of the United States, issued in conformity with the provisions of the third section of the act entitled "An act to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the Mississippi," approved on the 28th day of May, 1830, with full power and authority in the said Indians to divide said lands among the different tribes, nations, or bands in severalty, with the right to sell and convey to and from each other, under such laws and regulations as may be adopted by the respective tribes, acting by themselves, or by a general council of the said New York Indians acting for all the tribes collectively. It is understood and agreed that the above-described country is intended as a future home for the following tribes, to wit: the Senecas, Onondagas, Cayugas, Tuscaroras, Oneidas, Saint Regis, Stockbridges, Munsees, and Brothertowns residing in the State of New York, and the same is to be divided equally among them according to their respective numbers, as mentioned in a schedule hereunto annexed.

Mr. SCALES. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Nine minutes.

Mr. SCALES. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. HOOKER. I only desire to say a word or two. If the statement of my friend from Kansas be correct, that the Indians hold no title to this land, and that the subject-matter of title is a question which the courts might determine, why the necessity for this bill?

Mr. HASKELL. As a compromise.

Mr. HOOKER. If they hold no title, then they do not hold the land. If they do hold the land, they hold it by virtue of the second clause of the treaty which I have caused to be read, which not only gives it to them by solemn treaty, but by the patent of the Government.

Mr. HASKELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. HOOKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HASKELL. The gentleman will notice, as the House does, that that treaty speaks of tribes, and not of Indians at all All the powers and title go to tribes. Now, there was not a single tribe out there at all.

Mr. HOOKER. The gentleman will allow me to say that he is mistaken; because it will be observed that those of the tribes that failed to go and avail themselves of this grant of land in Kansas have forfeited their right, and those who did go there did not forfeit, whether they were sent by tribes or portions of tribes. It stands, so far as interpretation is concerned, precisely as the Choctaw treaty of 1832 in Mississippi stood, where those who remained in Mississippi were to have certain reservations. In other words, these Indians refused to concede their lands in New York and did not go to Kansas, but those who did concede their lands in New York and went to Kansas got the title of the Government according to the solemn treaties of the Government, which should not be broken; and more than that, they got title to the land by solemn patent of the Government.

Mr. SCALES. I desire to say only a few words in answer to the gentleman from Kansas, and I will occupy the short time I have in reading what the Secretary of the Interior has said, in order to settle the issues between myself and the gentleman from Kansas:

As early as 1842 members of certain tribes in the State of New York and elsewhere, who thought themselves entitled to the lands under the provisions of the treaty, removed to the country west of the State of Missouri and settled therein; and from time to time others followed them until a considerable number of Indians, as will be seen from census lists on file in the Indian Bureau, were found to be occupying these lands.

Now, listen to this:

From death and the hostility of the settlers who were drawn in that direction by the fertility of the soil and other advantages, all of the Indians gradually relinquished their selections until of the Indians who had removed thither from the State of New York only thirty-two remained in 1860.

Those are the Indian lands we are discussing, the lands that belong to the thirty-two Indians who went there and remained there until 1860. Then the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says:

Under these provisions thirty-two New York Indians removed to and remained in the Territory now embraced in the State of Kansas prior to June 16, 1860.

My friend from Kansas says the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior wrote these letters in regard to another bill. My friend is mistaken. It was the same bill identically, with this exception, that the gentleman from Kansas had then in the committee carried an amendment reducing the price of those lands to $2.50 per acre; and that was the bill submitted to the Department.

Mr. HASKELL. This bill bears the name of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES,] and is not the bill I wrote. I did, however, send my bill to the Secretary.

Mr. SCALES. That bill bears my name, and it is the identical bill that went before the committee. I introduced the bill at the instance of the Department, and the only difference is in the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Kansas. Here is what the Commissioner says:

The bill under consideration proposes to reduce the aggregate value of the unsold lands over one-half, or to $23,339.68, and if the lands are not sold at the diminished rate of $2.50 per acre within one year that patents shall issue in the names of the original allottees for the balance unsold.

The only issue between us to-day is as to the price of these lands. I am contending for the appraised value made by a commission sent there by the Government. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] is contending for the value set upon these lands by the settlers themselves, a value which has not been proved by anybody, and which is not sustained by one particle of evidence ever brought before the committee. We have nothing but the assertion of the gentleman from Kansas; and while I am disposed to pay much respect to what he says, yet he relies upon what these settlers say. Now, in regard to the value of these lands, this is what the Commissioner says:

The lands are in Bourbon County, one of the richest and most fertile counties in the State. They are within a few miles of Fort Scott, and near the line of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad—the Missouri River, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad running nearly through the center of the body of lands, which lie in close proximity to the corner of townships twenty-three and twenty-four in ranges twenty-four and twenty-five east. The records of the General Land Office show that there is scarcely a vacant forty-acre tract of land in or near the townships named. With these facts in view, it is safe to assume that the several tracts were, in 1873, worth the full amount at which they were appraised, and that, in view of the rapid development of the country, and the present price of uncultivated lands in that vicinity, there has at least been no depreciation of their value.

All the lands about these have been settled, and I stand here to-day asking only that these Indians may have what this Government has said through its appraisers this land is worth. It is insisted that the appraised value of these lands shall not be given, because there is no one here urging it, except the Indians themselves.

Mr. GODSHALK. Has not the time for debate expired?

The SPEAKER. There is one minute left.

Mr. SCALES. The Commissioner further says:

The settlers have been in possession of these lands for years, to the exclusion of the Indians, and have had every advantage and opportunity to pay for the lands from the products of the same.

This appraisal was made in 1873, and these settlers have had from that time to this to take these lands at their appraised value, and they have refused to do it. It is proposed now that another opportunity be given to them to take the lands at their appraised value, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] insists that the land shall be sold at $3 per acre. Under these circumstances, I do not consider it necessary to occupy the attention of the House for a longer time.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has expired.

Mr. PRESCOTT. In order to meet a contingency which I suggested with reference to persons who have already settled upon these lands, I ask permission to offer an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The House was dividing upon an amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole. Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] agree to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRESCOTT?]

Mr. HASKELL. I will if it is what I think it is.

Mr. BLAND. I object to any further debate or amendment.

The SPEAKER. If objection is made, the Chair cannot entertain the amendment. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the pending question?

The SPEAKER. The House is dividing on an amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the House shall vote down the amendment, will the bill be left in a shape to be properly amended?

Mr. SCALES. If we vote down all the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole, the bill will be right.

Mr. HASKELL. The gentleman does not mean to vote down his own amendment, fixing the time at five years instead of three years for the operation of this act?

Mr. SCALES. No, not that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The first amendment upon which the House is dividing will be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In section 1 strike out the words, "the appraised value of the said tracts, as heretofore ascertained by the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the provisions of the act of February 19, 1873, entitled 'An act to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas,'" and in lieu thereof insert the words "three dollars per acre;" so that the section will read:

"That those persons, being heads of families or single persons over twenty-one years of age, who have made settlement and improvement upon and are bona fide claimants and occupants of, either in person or by tenant, the lands in Kansas which were allotted to certain New York Indians and for which certificates of allotment, dated the 14th day of September, 1860, for three hundred and twenty acres of land each, were issued to thirty-two of said Indians, shall be, and hereby are, authorized and permitted to enter and purchase at the proper land office, at any time within one year from the passage of this act, said lands so occupied by them, in tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, according to the Government surveys, at not less than $3 per acre," &c.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that this amendment is recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and was agreed to by the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. SCALES. That is right.

Mr. HASKELL. And an affirmative vote by the House at this time is simply a vote to sustain the committee.

The SPEAKER. To sustain both committees, the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. SCALES. That is correct. It will be an indorsement of the action of both committees.

The SPEAKER. The tellers, the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. HASKELL, and the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. SCALES, will again resume their places, and the House will again vote upon agreeing to the amendment just read, reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 95, noes 67,

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. SCALES called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 33 in the affirmative; one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 98, not voting 75; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I agreed to pair with General WHITE, of Pennsylvania, who is absent. It was understood that I should vote on Private Calendar bills. But impressed with the belief that he would vote for this bill, and I having voted against it, I withdraw my vote.

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia, with Mr. WILBER, on political questions.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, with Mr. BARBER.

Mr. WHITE with Mr. SPARKS, on political questions.

Mr. ANDERSON with Mr. SMITH of New Jersey, for this day.

Mr. STEVENSON with Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. KETCHAM.

Mr. JAMES with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. HERNDON with Mr. SAPP.

Mr. COWGILL with Mr. BACHMAN, on political questions.

Mr. MCCOOK with Mr. MULLER, on political questions.

Mr. MILES with Mr. SINGLETON of Illinois.

Mr. ROSS with Mr. RUSSELL of Massachusetts.

Mr. OVERTON with Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee.

Mr. ERRETT with Mr. SCALES.

Mr. WASHBURN with Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.

Mr. DIBRELL. My colleague, Mr. SIMONTON, is confined to his room by illness. He is paired, as I understand, for this day and until further notice, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] is paired with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] as announced a few moments ago.

Mr. DIBRELL. Then I withdraw the statement as to the pair.

Mr. HAZELTON subsequently said: Mr. Speaker, a pair has been arranged, until further notice, between the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMONTON] and the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE,] who is absent on account of the dangerous sickness of his father.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. HASKELL. I now demand the previous question on the remaining amendments and on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was read, as follows:

In line 30 of section 1 strike out "three" and insert "five;" so that the clause will read:

"And the moneys arising from such sales shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, in trust for, and to be paid to, said Indians respectively to whom said certificates were issued, or to their heirs, upon satisfactory proof of their identity to the Secretary of the Interior, at any time within five years from the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next and last amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was read, as follows:

In line 4 of section 2 strike out "the appraised value" and insert "$3 per acre;" so that the clause will read:

"That any lands not entered by such settlers, at the expiration of one year from the passage of this act, shall be offered at public sale, in the usual manner, at not less than $3 per acre," &c.

The amendment was agreed to, there being—ayes 66, noes 39.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative; there being—ayes 79, noes 30.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HASKELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ABANDONMENT OF CAMP SHERIDAN.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the abandonment of Camp Sheridan; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RESTORATION OF CAPTAINS WINDER AND RANSOM.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, against the restoration of Captains Winder and Ransom; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MILITIA FORCE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the militia force of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. VAN AERNAM, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one week on account of important business.

CHARLES H. WILTBERGER, DECEASED.

On motion of Mr. FORD, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to the executor of the will of Charles H. Wiltberger, late of the District of Columbia, to withdraw the papers in his claim for pay for logs and wood cut upon his land in said District during the late war by the Union Army to build forts and for fuel; provided that no adverse report has been made on said claim, and that copies of said papers be left with the Clerk of the House.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of going to the Private Calendar.

Mr. O'NEILL. Before the House goes into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar I hope we will dispose of the unfinished bills now lying upon the Speaker's table coming over from last Friday.

Mr. COX. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot raise the question of consideration on the motion to go into committee, for if the House does not desire to go into Committee on the Private Calendar it can vote the motion down.

Mr. COX. I give notice, then, that if this motion is voted down I shall then move to proceed to the consideration of the apportionment bill, which is the unfinished business of yesterday.

The question recurred on Mr. BRIGHT's motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 49.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calenndar, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Private Calendar will be resumed; and the Clerk will report the first bill in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 3784) to compensate Asa Weeks for his labor and expenses in perfecting torpedoes, torpedo machinery, and the art of torpedo warfare for the sole and exclusive benefit of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I move that the bill be passed over.

Mr. FINLEY. I did not hear the gentleman's motion.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I have said several times before the reason why that bill should not be called up for action. I move it be passed over.

Mr. FINLEY. I do not object to that.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN S. CUNNINGHAM.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4605) for the relief of John S. Cunningham.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the proper accounting officers of the United States Treasury to place to the credit of John S. Cunningham the sum of $1,284.19, being the amount embezzled by his late clerk while stationed at the San Francisco Navy pay office, in the year 1878.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John S. Cunningham, a pay-director in the Navy of the United States, having considered the same, respectfully report:

This case was considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate during the third session of the Forth-fifth Congress, and a favorable report made thereon. From that report, which your committee adopts and makes a part of this report, it appears as follows: That—

"The memoralist is a pay-director in the Navy. He has been many years in the service, and has disbursed many millions of dollars, and his accounts, as appears by the certificates of the accounting officers of the Treasury, have been kept with remarkable clearness and accuracy, and have been rendered with unvarying promptness, having been always settled promptly to a cent.

"He was stationed at the Navy pay-office, San Francisco, California, where he made it a rule not to permit any money to be drawn from the Treasury for the use of his office, but paid every bill, however small in amount, by check on the sub-Treasury. He had invented a system of recording a history of bills and payments in a book, which is highly commended by the Fourth Auditor as a security against fraud. He was accustomed to draw his checks payable to order, but the assistant treasurer at San Francisco refused payment of them, and required him to make them payable to bearer. In accordance with this requirement he drew three checks, one for $720, to pay a bill of the California Cracker Company; one for $361.72, to pay a bill of Whittier, Fuller & Co.; and one for $202.47, to pay a bill of James E. Jordan; in all, $1,284.19, which were intrusted to Franklin Philp, his clerk, a sworn officer, approved by the Navy Department, and who embezzled them and applied the proceeds to his own use. Immediately on discovering the embezzlement Captain Cunningham deposited of his own funds the amount of the checks in the United States Treasury, and obtained therefor transfer drafts on San Francisco, which he at once forwarded to the parties for whom the embezzled checks were intended. The clerk absconded, and is wholly irresponsible.

"Whatever are the objections to indemnifying disbursing officers for losses inflicted upon them by their subordinates, they can hardly apply when the loss is occasioned by a compulsory mode of drawing the checks against which the officer protested, and when, if he had been permitted to draw them in the mode which he attempted for the greater security of the Government, the loss would not have occurred. It appears that the loss was caused by no fault or neglect of the memorialist, but by the requirement of the Treasury officers that the checks should be made payable to bearer."

Your committee is of the opinion that relief should be granted to the memorialist, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. PRICE. Was there any testimony to prove that an assistant treasurer of the United States refused to pay a check payable to order?

Mr. DAVIDSON. I will read it, and I am glad the gentleman has asked the question.

Mr. PRICE. It is a most singular proceeding, then.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I will state, as further evidence of the justice of the claim, that it has passed the Senate.

Mr. PRICE. I do not object, but only want to know that one thing.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Here is the testimony:

"Must be drawn to bearer."

OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES ASSISTANT TREASURER,
San Francisco, October 28, 1875.

SIR: Checks on this office must be drawn payable to bearer, and only in exceptional cases, when drawn payable to order and coming through some bank or well-known business firm, will such checks be paid.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM SHERMAN,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

To Captain J. S. CUNNINGHAM,
Pay Director, United States Navy.

---

Protest against "bearer" checks.

UNITED STATES NAVY PAY OFFICE, 434 CALIFORNIA STREET,
San Francisco, California, July 19, 1876.

SIR: The inclosed official check of this Navy pay office, No. 1666, dated June 30, 1876, payable to the order of Catherine Kennedy, for $20, (allotment,) was this day refused payment by the assistant treasurer in San Francisco, on the plea that the Navy pay office must draw checks to bearer.

This check is taken from the book of checks furnished to me by the Assistant Treasurer at San Francisco. I inclose also the circular of the Assistant Treasurer at San Francisco of October 28, 1875. You can readily see how this office is constantly embarrassed by the conduct of the Assistant Treasurer at San Francisco, and I must earnestly and respectfully ask for some relief at your hands.

Is it fair to ask this office to trust checks payable to bearer in the hazard of the post-office?

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN S. CUNNINGHAM,
Pay Director, United States Navy.

To Hon. A. U. WYMAN,
Treasurer of United States, Washington, D. C.

Navy. No. 1666.] PAY DIRECTOR,
San Francisco, 30th June, 1876.

Vignette by the Treasury Department. Farragut. } 1 B. Assistant Treasurer of the United States, San Francisco, California.

Pay to the order of Catherine Kennedy, twenty dollars.

State objects for which drawn.
For two allotments in her favor, $20.

JOHN S. CUNNINGHAM,
Pay Director, United States Navy.

Mr. Cunningham did all he could do to correct this. Whatever loss occurred arose from no fault or negligence on the part of Mr. Cunningham. I can add, further, that he is a most efficient officer, and in years past has disbursed $9,000,000 of Government funds and settled his accounts to the last cent.

Mr. PRICE. I am not calling in question that fact; but I merely asked whether there was any testimony conclusive of the point that an assistant treasurer refused to pay a check payable to order?

Mr. HOUSE. There is. The letter has been read.

Mr. PRICE. Who was it?

Mr. DAVIDSON. William Sherman, assistant treasurer United States.

Mr. DAVIDSON moved the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

LANGLEY B. CULLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3826) for the relief of the heirs of the late Langley B. Culley.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to pay to the heirs of the late Langley B. Culley, a naval constructor in the Navy of the United States, the sum of $2,300, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in payment for all services now due the heirs of said Culley from the United States.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of the heirs of Langley B. Culley, a naval constructor in the Navy of the United States, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

It appears by the records of the Navy Department that Langley B. Culley was appointed a naval constructor by the late John Y. Mason, Secretary of the Navy, February 26, 1845, at a salary, as stated in his letter of appointment, of $2,300 per annum; and that said appointment was revoked by George Bancroft, who succeeded Mr. Mason as Secretary of the Navy, April 17, 1845, Mr. Culley having accepted the appointment in a letter dated February 26, 1845. It also appears that at the time of his appointment and acceptance of the office he owned and occupied a ship-yard in Baltimore, Maryland, where he was doing a successful business in the line of his profession; and in order to enter on the discharge of the duties of the office to which he had been appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, he sold out his ship-yard, and sacrificed a flourishing business; and after holding himself in readiness for fifty days to obey the orders of the Navy Department, he was informed by the Secretary of the Navy that in consequence of the failure of Congress to make an appropriation for the pay of the office to which he had been appointed, said appointment was revoked. In the mean time his business arrangements had been broken up, and his ship-yard had passed into other hands.

From the numerous statements which the committee have examined, all of which bear testimony to the high moral, intellectual, and professional abilities of Mr. Culley, and of his eminent fitness for the position to which he had been appointed, and taking into consideration the sacrifices which he made in accepting said appointment, and for which neither he nor his heirs have received any compensation, the committee are unanimously of the opinion that his heirs are justly and equitably entitled to at least one year's pay, at the rate named in his letter of appointment, and herewith report the accompanying bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

PASSED ASSISTANT ENGINEER ABSALOM KIRBY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4607) for the relief of Passed Assistant Engineer Absalom Kirby, of the Navy.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act of March 3, 1873, restoring Passed Assistant Engineer Absalom Kirby to the active list of the Navy, be so construed as to allow him the pay of his present grade from the 11th of October, 1866, the date from which he takes rank, and a sum sufficient to pay him the amount found to be due is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The report was read, as follows:

The facts in the case of Absalom Kirby, passed assistant engineer, United States Navy, show that he was placed on the retired list as a second assistant engineer January 22, 1866, under a misapprehension, having been on sick leave but twenty-eight days, and was ordered on duty six weeks afterward and kept on duty nearly the whole time that he was on the retired list, four years and six months of which time he served at sea. On the 3d of March, 1873, an act was passed, upon the recommendation of the Navy Department, restoring him to his original position on the active list. Upon application at the Treasury Department for difference of pay, after promotion in the usual form, he was informed that he was debarred from payment because he was on the retired list at the date of his commission, notwithstanding he was at sea performing the same duty as other officers; and it is shown in the last Navy Register that under his present commission he has had more sea service, with one exception, than any officer in the United States Navy.

The Secretary of the Navy, in reply to an inquiry addressed to his Department as aforesaid, says:

"NAVY DEPARTMENT,
"Washington, March 6, 1878.

"SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the petition of Passed Assistant Engineer Absalom Kirby to be allowed the pay of his present grade from October 11, 1866, the time from which his commission as such dates, regarding which request such information as the Department can afford, as well as its views as to the propriety of granting the relief asked.

"Mr. Kirby, then a second assistant engineer, was regularly retired January 22, 1866, for supposed physical disability. He subsequently performed active duty, the law prohibiting retired officers from being ordered on active duty not having been passed until March 3, 1873. The performance of this duty, and the merits of the case according to the views of the Engineer-in-Chief of the Navy, are stated in his report on the petition as follows:

"'BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING,
"'Washington, March 5, 1878.

"'The allegations and statements in regard to service and dates made in this paper by Passed Assistant Engineer Absalom Kirby are found to be correct, after careful comparison with the records in this bureau, and it is believed that the retirement of Mr. Kirby was caused by a misapprehension of his physical condition at the time, as he was ordered to active duty shortly after the date of his retirement, and performed it to the entire satisfaction of his superior officers. Part of this duty came under my personal observation, and I can testify to the zeal and ability of Mr. Kirby in performing sea duty in the winter months on the coast of the United States. Believing the application of Mr. Kirby equitable and just in every respect, I most respectfully recommend it to the favorable consideration of Congress.'

"An act was passed March 3, 1873, (17 Stats., 581,) which authorized Mr. Kirby's restoration to his original position on the active list as a second assistant engineer, but the act contained no provision as to the difference of pay between active and retired pay for the time he was on the retired list. His restoration to his original position by special act seems to have been a recognition of his claims to it and an indication that he should suffer no injury by the act of retirement, although the intention of Congress is not known, viewing the restoration as such recognition.

"I see no objection to granting the relief he asks, but if granted there should be provision made for the payment of the difference of pay to which entitled, as there are no appropriations which can be used for the purpose.

"Respectfully,

"R. W. THOMPSON,
"Secretary of the Navy."

The reason application was not made to Congress at an earlier period for relief grew out of the fact that immediately after his restoration he was ordered to a foreign station.

The committee are satisfied and believe this to be a meritorious case, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. HARMER. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

LOUIS P. DI CESNOLA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1359) for the relief of Louis P. Di Cesnola, late consul at Cyprus.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Louis P. Di Cesnola the sum of $5,500, the amount paid by him for the official expenses of his consulate while consul at Cyprus, which said sum is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The report was read, as follows:

The petition states that General Cesnola was appointed United States consul at Cyprus in the year 1865, and served until June, 1876, a period of eleven years; that during this time the duties of his office compelled him to employ an interpreter at a salary of $30 per month in gold and a consular guard at a salary of $12 per month in gold, which he regularly paid out of his own private funds, amounting to the total sum of over five thousand five hundred dollars, for which he prays to be reimbursed.

It appears that all the other consulates in Turkey receive $500 each per annum as appropriated by Congress, for interpreter and guard hire, with the exception of Cyprus, and which was also allowed General Cesnola's predecessor, Mr. J. Judson Barclay, by Congress passing a special act for his relief.

The petition is accompanied by copies of duly authenticated vouchers, and certificates of payment by General Cesnola, on file in the Department of State, and also by a letter from Hon. William M. Evarts, Secretary of State, to Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, Speaker of the House of Representatives, confirming the statements of General Cesnola, and recommending that the relief prayed for be granted accordingly, and which is made part of this report.

The committee are of opinion that the petitioner's claim is not only just and equitable, but indisputable, and therefore report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York who reported this bill from the Committee on Foreign Affairs if there is any evidence that during these eleven years when General Di Cesnola was incurring this personal expense that he asked for payment from the State Department. It would seem from this bill that no such demand had been made. It would, in my judgment, establish a bad precedent to thus allow consuls to incur unusual expenses and let them run on from year to year and then after the lapse of a long period to come in and ask Congress for relief. In the present case it would seem that if he was entitled to the amount of these expenses, he should have made his claim to the State Department from year to year in his reports. This does not appear to have been done.

Mr. COX. I understand that was done. The account was rendered but there was no provision made to pay such expenses. He relied, however, on the precedents and the promise of the Department that he should be reimbursed. I went myself to the State Department and had the sanction of Mr. Evarts to the validity of the claim.

General Di Cesnola is a gentleman well known to many of the military men and to every one in New York City as an excellent gentleman of high scientific attainments, and his duties in connection with that consulate compelled him to have this interpreter and guard to carry out his instructions from the Department. Supposing that he would be reimbursed, he paid it out of his own pocket. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have unanimously reported in favor of it, and I move that it be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. DUNNELL. One word more, Mr. Chairman. It would seem as if the State Department should have recommended that some time during these eleven years——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to receive a message from the President?

Mr. DUNNELL. Certainly.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CARLISLE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President was received, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

LOUIS P. DI CESNOLA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DUNNELL. I was remarking, Mr. Chairman, that it would seem as if the State Department should have asked Congress at some time during these eleven years to supply this officer with this needed assistance. The necessity for this assistance of which the gentleman from New York speaks seems to have existed all along during the eleven years. The precedent that this would establish, which I regard as a dangerous one, is, that if a consul of his own motion may see proper to hire a doorkeeper or watchman he can do so and bring in a bill thereafter for payment in the aggregate by Congress. He ought to be required to inform the Department of the necessity of these officers, and be supplied, rather than pay out the amount and then bring in a bill to be reimbursed.

There is a case here upon the Calendar, of which I know personally, where a consul, many years ago, paid out money without any authority. If he does so he must do so at his own peril; and I imagine this will be a bad and dangerous precedent, if Congress shall establish it. I know nothing, of course, of the merits of the case, except what has been stated here in the report of the committee, but I object to it on the grounds that I have stated.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Minnesota will observe by looking at a portion of the report which has not been read by the Clerk, on page 3, that this is only following another precedent. If he will read the letter from Mr. Seward, when he was at the head of the State Department, in the Barclay case, he will find that a precedent has been established for this same condition of things. The letter to which I refer is as follows:

STATE DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 10, 1866.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 12th ultimo, inclosing a certificate of J. Judson Barclay, esq., late United States consul at Cyprus, relative to his account for dragoman and guard hire, inquiring as to its correctness, I have the honor to inform you that the statements which he makes agree with the funds and vouchers recorded in this Department, and inasmuch as appropriations for interpreters, guards, and other expenses are made for all other consulates in the Turkish Dominions, namely, Constantinople, Smyrna, Alexandria, Jerusalem, Beirût, the Department knows of no reason why a discrimination should be made against Cyprus, and therefore recommend that it be placed in this respect upon the same footing as the other consulates in that country.

W. H. SEWARD.

Hon. W. A. NEWELL, House of Representatives.

That was in 1866. General Cesnola acted on that precedent. And it was an omission on the part of Congress when it failed to reimburse him.

Mr. DUNNELL. But it seems to have been a continuing omission.

Mr. COX. It was.

Mr. DUNNELL. And it seems Congress acted intelligently.

Mr. COX. Mr. Barclay stood in exactly the same position.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have no wish to offer any opposition to this bill; but it seems to me to be establishing a dangerous precedent.

Mr. COX. We have the recommendation of the Department; the recommendations of Secretary Seward and Secretary Evarts. We have the necessary vouchers. It is shown that these expenses are necessary for the protection of consuls in that island, and in all Turkish countries. It is a case based on equity and precedent.

Mr. PRICE. Do I understand the gentleman to say the payment of this bill is recommended by the Secretary of State?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRICE. That would go far to allay my objections. But I must say that it is a most singular, and if the gentleman from New York had not said there were precedents for it, I would say an unprecedented proceeding.

This gentleman is appointed a consul. At the end of a year he finds himself minus $500 because he had to employ an interpreter and guard. Now if a business man—and the presumption is he is a business man, or he would not be there although the presumption may be a violent one—he would apply at the end of the year to the State Department and say "I am out $500 for these necessary expenditures." Then they either say he is entitled to that or they say he is not entitled to it. But he lets it run another year and says he has incurred $500 more of expenditure. And so on it goes from year to year until eleven years have elapsed, and all that time he has not been paid any $500 a year by the Government. All that time he has not learned the language of the country in which he is stationed, and keeps up his interpreter and guard, continues that expense and pays the money out of his own pocket; and then five years afterward he comes to Congress and asks to be reimbursed for the money he has expended.

If this thing is done—and I presume it will be, for I never knew a case where it was not done, in this Congress—then the next claimant will plead not only the precedents that already exist but this also as an additional precedent. And so we go on year after year piling up precedents.

Hills peep o'er hills
And Alps on Alps arise.

Mr. COX. I desire to say one word in reply. I think my friend will take the judgment of the present Secretary of State as well as of Mr. Seward on this matter. If General Cesnola had been a very strict business man he would not have acted in the way he did.

Mr. PRICE. Exactly; but he ought to have acted as a business man.

Mr. COX. He being a soldier, having been appointed to this consulate after he had gone through the war, and perhaps being a little loose about business matters, knowing he would get this when he came home, did not pursue it with that strictness which he should have exhibited. But he sent in his vouchers; and when he came here the Secretary of State said Congress would certainly pay him. Here is what the Secretary says:

The same considerations—

As in Barclay's case—

exist with equal force in the case of General Di Cesnola, and I therefore recommend that the petitioner's appeal be favorably acted upon by the proper committee, and that relief be accorded to him for the period during which he held the post of consul at Cyprus.

Mr. PRICE. Then it follows, and is admitted by the gentleman from New York, that General Cesnola is a loose business man; and it would follow also, as an inference from his remark, that the having gone into the Army made him a loose business man. I was not in the Army myself, and am unable to say what effect that would have in giving a man loose business habits.

Mr. COX. I have seen a great many loose business men that were not in the Army, and vice versa I have seen many that were in the Army.

Mr. PRICE. Men of that kind should not be appointed to consulates.

Mr. COX. We have to reward our soldiers in various ways.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is one precedent that will be established if we pass this bill that cannot be easily established again. General Cesnola served well in the Army. That has nothing to do with the justice of this case here, of course. But as he incurred this expenditure under a reasonable hope that he would be paid, and in consideration of the extraordinary services he has rendered to science during his consulate in Cyprus, I am willing to pay him. And if any consul hereafter shall confer so great honor on his country and render so extraordinary a service to the arts and to students of history I would be willing to deal very liberally with him. I am not disposed to draw the lines so closely with a man who has done so much honor to his country as General Cesnola has done.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Connecticut one question. If he had been consul at Cyprus and the Government had owed him $500 for a year's expenses and had failed to pay him—I do not say refused to pay him—and if the gentleman had gone on another year and expended another $500 and the Government failed to pay him, would he have continued going on in that way for eleven years, and not till five years afterward come in with a claim for payment?

Mr. HAWLEY. The case is quite impossible; for I could not have gone on for two years unless the Government had paid me the $500. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. One word more, in answer to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE.] If there is any lack of business quality about this matter at all, that lack of business quality belongs to Congress. Let the people send better men here. The State Department has again and again asked that this appropriation be made and pay the consul to Cyprus along with the other consuls in Turkey.

Mr. PRICE. Before the expiration of the eleven years?

Mr. COX. I suppose so, because Mr. Barclay got it and it was understood it would be received by his successor, and the office was taken with that understanding.

Mr. PRICE. Well, on consideration of his being "a loose business man," I suppose we must pay it.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARY W. JONES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2572) granting a pension to Mary W. Jones, introduced by Mr. HUNTON, and reported from the Committee on Pensions by Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary W. Jones, widow of Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, late commodore in the United States Navy, and pay her a pension of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension she now receives, from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read as follows:

The Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812, to whom was referred the petition of Mary W. Jones, praying for an increase of pension from $30 to $50 per month, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

It is in evidence that the petitioner is the widow of Commodore Thomas Ap C. Jones, who, for fifty-three years, was a distinguished officer of the United States Navy. While in the discharge of his duty as commander of the United States flotilla at the battle of New Orleans he received a wound from which he never fully recovered. He died in the year 1858.

It is also in evidence that the son of the petitioner, Lieutenant Commander M. Patterson Jones, was also for twenty-five years in the United States Navy, serving with fidelity during the late war of the rebellion, and that he died suddenly in 1866 while on duty at the navy-yard at Washington, District of Columbia. The loyalty of the petitioner is clearly shown by evidence filed with the petition.

It is also in evidence that the petitioner received a pension from July 1, 1858, to January 1, 1870, at $50 per month, at which time it was reduced, in common with others, to $30 per month.

The committee are of the opinion that, in view of the eminent services of both her husband and son, the high rank of these officers, and the now destitute condition of the petitioner, she is entitled to the relief prayed for, and should receive the original pension that was granted her at the rate of $50 per month, and therefore recommend that she be restored to the pension-rolls at that rate, to take effect from the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

SARAH M. BIRDSALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3732) granting a pension to Sarah M. Birdsall, introduced by Mr. BAILEY, and reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. DIBRELL.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah M. Birdsall, the only surviving heir of Major Benjamin Birdsall, of the war of 1812, at the rate of $8 per month.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3732), having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

Sarah M. Birdsall is the only surviving heir of Major Ben Birdsall, a gallant officer and soldier of the war of 1812, who served through that war and retained his command until he was assassinated in his camp by one of his own soldiers in July, 1818, leaving a widow and three young children in very limited circumstances, all of whom are dead except the petitioner, Sarah M. Birdsall, who is an invalid, walking upon crutches.

The petitioner states that no bounty-land warrant or pension was ever received by any of the family of said deceased, or any other recognition made of the gallant services of the officer in the war of 1812.

Your committee therefore, in consideration of the services rendered by the said Major Birdsall, and the fact that none of his heirs have ever received a pension or land warrant for his services, and that this his only living heir is a cripple and destitute, recommend that the bill be amended so as to allow her $8 per month, and as amended that it do pass.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to offer a verbal amendment. By a mistake in the original draught of the bill an incorrect name is inserted. It should be "Martha," instead of "Sarah." I therefore move that the name "Sarah," both in the body of the bill and in the title, be stricken out and the name "Martha" inserted.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

BETSEY ELWELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4608) granting a pension to Betsey Elwell, reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions by Mr. FARR.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Betsey Elwell, formerly Betsey Butler, widow of Jeremiah Elwell, a private in the Twenty-first Regiment United States Infantry, war of 1812, at the rate of $8 per month, to date from the passage of the act of March 9, 1878, "granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and their widows, and for other purposes."

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Betsey Elwell for pension, as widow of Jeremiah Elwell, a private, &c., having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

The committee find that the said Jeremiah Elwell was a soldier of the war of 1812, and was in receipt of a pension at the time of his death. The petitioner, Betsey Elwell, was living with him at that time as his wife; had lived with him as such, and been so regarded, for upward of fifty years; that, in fact, she was married to said Elwell upon March 2, 1827, as is shown by the records of the clerk's office of the town of Gorham, county of Cumberland, State of Maine; but that said marriage was illegal for the reason that said Elwell then had another wife living from whom he had not been divorced according to law, but who had deserted him and was living with another man as his wife, and by whom she has had eight children, never having had any by said Elwell; that she is long since dead, and thus no claim can be presented by her.

In view of these facts, and for the reason that the petitioner was to all intents and purposes the only wife of Elwell for the greater portion of his life, your committee are of the opinion that her prayer should be granted, and that she should be allowed the same pension which the law would have entitled her to if this question of legality had not arisen; therefore, in order to overcome this technicality, they beg to submit the accompanying bill and recommend that it be passed.

Mr. ATKINS. I would like for the gentleman who has charge of this bill to explain to the House why this applicant could not have obtained her pension at the Pension Bureau.

Mr. BREWER. I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] that the gentleman who reported this bill, Mr. Farr, of New Hampshire, is now dead.

Mr. DWIGHT. And I will state further that I heard Mr. Farr say that after a careful examination of all the facts in the case, he had no doubt that this bill should be passed.

Mr. BRIGGS. I suppose the reason why this pension was not allowed at the Pension Office was because the applicant was not technically the widow of this soldier, although she was married to him and lived with him for forty or fifty years as his wife. The report which has been read sets forth the facts of the case. The reason she did not obtain her pension from the Pension Bureau was that, legally, she was not the wife of this soldier.

Mr. ATKINS. I know it is a very ungracious thing for any gentleman to show any opposition to a bill granting a pension to any person whatever. But when I reflect that we will be called upon this year to appropriate nearly seventy million dollars for pensions, outside of the special cases acted upon by Congress, it seems to me it is time that we should call a halt.

I do not desire to object to this particular bill, and will not do so, for the reason, in the first place, that I know nothing about it; in the second place, I will not object because the applicant is a lady, and, in the third place, I will not object because the member who reported this bill has passed to the hereafter.

But I do think, if I may be allowed to say so, coming from the section of the country I do, if there are any sections—I had thought they were all abolished—coming from the State I do and with the antecedents I have, and occupying upon the floor of this House the official position I do, I feel it to be my duty to throw out this little warning to members here. We will not get off this year with much less than $70,000,000 for pensions.

I would sooner to-day undertake to liquidate the entire public debt of this country than to liquidate the debt which has been imposed upon the country by our pension laws. The arrearages act which passed last Congress has imposed an obligation upon this country which cannot be liquidated with less than $750,000,000, although it was stated at the time the bill was under consideration that the outside figure would be $20,000,000 or $25,000,000. I doubt not, considering the rate at which the claims have been and are now being presented, th ateventually it will amount to a thousand million dollars.

Mr. BRIGGS. I knew nothing about this case until my attention was called to it by the report just read by the Clerk. I have no doubt the facts are truly set forth in that report. The reason the applicant comes here is that, technically, although she lived with this soldier for forty years as his wife, she was not legally his wife, and therefore could not obtain her pension.

I must say that it seems to me this is rather a small matter for the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to make the occasion of complaining of the vast amount expended for pensions to the soldiers of this country. I recognize that it is a vast amount. But when we compare the sums that are contributed to these men with the valuable services which they have rendered the country, they are not to be considered for a single moment. But for these men we would have had no country, we would have had no Congress of the United States to grant them pensions.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIGGS] does not intend to go into a sectional discussion and to rake up the embers of the war because I made the remarks I did. I did so from a pure business stand-point, without any kind of prejudice. If that gentleman thinks I have any prejudices on account of my antecedents, I believe he stands alone in this House in entertaining that opinion of me.

Mr. BRIGGS. I do not propose to rake up the embers of the war. I do not propose to reopen a discussion of sectional questions. I never have done that in any single instance since I have been a member of this House. But I tell the gentleman from Tennessee that when he rises in his place and attempts to prevent the payment of pensions to the men who have preserved the life of the nation, I propose to stand here in defense of those men, and to insist that full, ample, and complete justice shall be done them. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Chairman, while this question is up, I wish to say a few words upon it. I have heretofore opposed, not the granting of pensions, but the granting of them in a mode in which no other department of this Government acts. The action of Congress in reference to persons presenting claims under the pension laws is conducted in nine cases out of ten in an entirely different manner from our action with regard to other matters which have been passed upon by various Departments of the Government. When we have passed general laws giving jurisdiction to the Commissioner of Pensions, and have provided all sorts of clerks and legal appliances so as to insure the benefit of the pension laws to those entitled to them, no man ought to say there is any opposition here to the granting of pensions.

These pensions are, gentlemen may say, a matter of debt; I say they are a matter of grace and favor on the part of the Government; but upon whatever grounds you put these claims, the Government says in effect, "We have established laws by which the applicant, on complying with proper requirements, can obtain his pension." The character of evidence required is prescribed, as well as rules and regulations by which the officers of the Government are to be controlled. Ought not this to satisfy any gentleman, from whatever section he may come? Ought not the decision of the Pension Office for or against the applicant to be final, so far as the case may come within the provisions of general law? But, sir, three-fourths of the pension cases passed on in this House are nothing but appeals from the action of the Department to which we have by law intrusted the examination of such cases. I say that the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] without reference to the question whether this is a revolutionary pension, or a pension of the late war, or a pension of the war of 1812, does right to warn the country——

Mr. ATKINS. I want to say that I did not know what war this claim had reference to.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman from Tennessee, I say, does right to warn the country as to the effect of congressional action on this subject. When we have by our laws provided means for the hearing and determination of applications for pensions, with the implied understanding that the applicant shall go to that tribunal for the decision of his case, I say it is time that the public mind should be aroused to the possible effect of further action by Congress, and that Congress should stop in this work.

Why, sir, notwithstanding the vast number of the questions judicially decided by the Patent Office, how very rarely does Congress interfere in such cases, except under extraordinary circumstances? The same may be said as to the action of the Land Office, the different branches of the Treasury Department, and the other Departments of this Government. The decisions of these various Departments are in general accepted by Congress as final and conclusive. They ought to be; and especially ought this to be the case in reference to pensions.

When a party makes application for a pension the Pension Office decides between the people on the one hand and the claimant on the other. That judgment, except where there is fraud, is binding on the Government; but it is not binding upon the pensioner, who in numerous cases comes here and asks that a committee of Congress shall review the action of the Commissioner. I say that the jurisdiction of Congress in pension cases should be confined to cases of which the Pension Office has no jurisdiction. This is the true principle, and it should be established as governing the action of Congress.

Mr. COFFROTH and Mr. SPARKS addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COFFROTH.]

Mr. REED. I sincerely hope that a general discussion will not arise on this bill, though I should like to have it arise on the next one.

Mr. COFFROTH. Mr. Chairman, when the declaration is made here and goes to the country that the arrears of pensions will cost this Government $700,000,000, I cannot permit that statement to pass uncontradicted.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. COFFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. When I made the statement a moment ago that it would in my opinion cost $700,000,000 to liquidate the debt that had been imposed on the Government in consequence of the passage of the arrearage act, I made the statement upon the authority of the Commissioner of Pensions, who had fixed the amount at $710,000,000. I intimated that in my judgment it would reach $750,000,000, or even $1,000,000,000, if the Commissioner should continue to increase his estimate for the year to come as he has within a year past.

Mr. COFFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not say the gentleman from Tennessee made this declaration on his own authority, but it has been stated in the newspapers and published throughout the country on the authority of the Commissioner of Pensions that the arrears of pensions will cost this Government $710,000,000. I propose to refute that statement with figures which cannot be mistaken. There are pending now in the Pensions Department 307,697 applications. Two hundred and thirty-six thousand and sixty-six are by original invalid applicants, the balance, 71,631, by widows, minor children, and dependent fathers and mothers. From a statement made from data furnished by competent persons who are familiar with the average paid to pension applicants where their pensions are granted, it appears the average paid to widows is $991.03; upon original invalid claims, $733.59. Now, take the 236,066 applications. If every one of them be granted it will amount to $173,175,656.94. To widows, dependent mothers, fathers, and to minors it will amount to $70,988,469.83. If every person who has applied up to the 1st day of July, 1880, when the arrears bill terminated, be put upon the pension-roll on the average already paid, it will amount to $244,164,126.77. The full table is as follows:

One hundred and ninety-one claims for bounty land and 29,662 claims for arrears of pensions were allowed during the year.

Total amount paid during the year to new pensioners, upon first payments, is to—

|---|---|
| Army invalids | $7,236,959 69 |
| Army widows, &c | 4,215,871 78 |
| Navy invalids | 159,159 41 |
| Navy widows, &c | 135,201 62 |
| War of 1812, survivors | 54,816 70 |
| War of 1812, widows of, &c | 666,182 10 |
| | 12,468,191 20 |

The above table will be found in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, page 17. It will be observed that 9,865 invalid pensioners were placed on the pension-roll during the year 1880, with a total cost for their arrears of $7,236,959.69, or an average to each individual pensioner of $733.59+. There were also placed upon the pension-roll during the said year 4,254 widows and other heirs, to whom were paid as arrears $4,215,871.78, or an average each of $991.03+.

On page 23 of the same report the Commissioner states that there were pending June 30, 1880, 236,066 original invalid claims. Multiplying this gross number by the average in each case allowed during the year 1880, namely, $733.59, the amount would be $173,175,656.94. On the same page (23) of said report the Commissioner states that there were pending June 30, 1880, 71,631 widows and other heirs' claims. Multiplying this gross number by the average amount allowed each of this class of claimants during the year 1880, namely, $991.03, it amounts to $70,988,469.93. Adding these two amounts together, that is, the invalid claims and the widows and other heirs, there were pending 307,697, to which would be paid the sum of $244,164,126.87, or an average of $793.52+; this supposing that every one of the 307,697 were allowed. These figures are taken from Mr. Bentley's report, and thus show conclusively that in no event would they amount to more than the sum stated.

The Commissioner admits in his letter of January 20, 1881, to Secretary Schurz, by whom it was transmitted to Hon. H. G. DAVIS, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that there should be deducted 30 per cent. on account of claims which will not be allowed. A more proper reduction would be to reduce at once this total of 307,697 by eliminating one-third, or 102,565+, as cases already rejected or abandoned, and improperly in the files of "pending cases," he having consolidated the rejected files with the pending files, and reporting to Congress only two classes of claims, "admitted" and "pending;" and under the head of "pending" including all claims which have been rejected or abandoned during the whole period since the commencement of the war of 1861-'65. Mr. Bentley himself, in his report of 1878, admits 80,000 of these as "rejected," "settled," "disposed of." They were once borne separately as "rejected," and are now falsely entered as "pending" or "live" cases.

A further additional reduction of 20 per cent. should be made from the 205,132 remaining cases, which will for various reasons be rejected in the future or abandoned, making 143,591 to be deducted from 307,697, leaving only 164,106 to be added to the rolls. Multiplying this 164,106 by the average above indicated, $793.52+, it would require but $130,221,393.12 as the total amount required to pay the arrears to all claimants who will be entitled to future benefits under the arrears law.

These figures are based upon the presumption that the pensions hereafter granted would be made at as high a grade as were those allowed during the year 1880.

The Commissioner of Pensions states in his testimony before the select committee of the House of Representatives, on page 11: "These and other like influences conspired to keep those having slight wounds and light diseases, and were in comfortable circumstances, from filing claims for pension. Some of them, too, did not think it worth while, feeling that a pension of two or four dollars a month would not amount to anything," &c. This fact, stated by the Commissioner, together with the additional fact that thousands of claims filed under the arrears law were from widows who remarried within one, two, or three years, or soon after the death of the soldier; thus they would be entitled to but one, two, or three hundred dollars. The average to each would therefore be less than the average to each pensioner during the year 1880, during which period it was $793.52+.

Six hundred dollars is a liberal average for arrears to those who are to be hereafter added—that is, to the 164,106; but at this rate the total arrears would amount to but $98,463,600; but if the great number of 200,000 should be added to the roll, at this average it would amount to but $120,000,000, instead of $510,000,000, or thereabout, as reported by the Commissioner of Pensions.

It has been reported by the Commissioner of Pensions and others that the yearly value of the roll would amount for many years to $50,000,000 or thereabout. This is exceedingly erroneous. It will be found by referring to this same table that there were dropped from the rolls, during the year 1880, 12,875 pensioners, with the yearly value of their pensions amounting to $1,423,967; that there were 2,751 pensioners reduced in rate to the amount of $73,645.32 per annum, making a total reduction in the yearly value of $1,497,612.32. It will also be found, by this same table, that there were 19,545 added to the roll during the year 1880, at a yearly value of $1,746,173.43; that there were 9,286 pensioners increased in rating to the yearly amount of $437,441, and that there were restored to the rolls 1,377 pensioners at a total cost of $80,194, making the total additional cost of the pension-roll, by the addition thereto of 19,545 pensioners, increasing the rates of 9,286, and restoring to the rolls 1,377—$2,263,808.43. Deducting from this additional cost the reduction before referred to, the yearly additional cost of the entire roll, notwithstanding that there have been 19,545 added thereto, is but $766,196.11, or an average additional cost of only $39.20+.

This table, therefore, demonstrates that, after deducting losses, it costs but $39.20+ of annual payments on the average to place a pensioner upon the roll. Applying this average to the probable additions to the pension rolls, viz, 164,106, it will cost annually but $6,432,955.20; add to this the present yearly value of pensions as appears from this table, to wit, $25,917,906.60, it makes a total of $32,350,861.80. If the rolls be increased by the addition of a total number of 200,000, it would cost but $7,840,000 in addition to the present yearly value, making for the total 200,000 so added a gross yearly value of only $33,757,906.60, the highest amount that the yearly value of the pension-roll can ever reach under existing law, instead of $50,000,000, or thereabout, reported by the Commissioner of Pensions.

It will be observed that in these figures no reduction has been made in the yearly value of the addition on account of the claims being from soldiers slightly wounded or diseased. The additions to the pension-roll will not average more than grade of one-half total—$4 per month or $48 per year. During the last year original invalids received on an average $70.62+.

The fact that those to be added to the rolls are for "slight wounds and light diseases," as appears from the testimony of Commissioner Bentley, (page 11, select committee, H. R.,) will make the average rates lower than heretofore and prevent the yearly value of the pension-roll ever exceeding $32,500,000.

Mr. ATKINS. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. COFFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. ATKINS. How, then, is it the Commissioner of Pensions came to make such a blunder?

Mr. COFFROTH. Why, sir, here is his own report which I hold in my hand, and why he made this blunder is not for me to say, unless he wants to force the bill now pending in the Senate through the Senate and through this House, creating examining boards consisting of one attorney and one surgeon in each congressional district, substantially under his control, thus putting unlimited power into his hands.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to ask this further question. I do not myself believe the Commissioner of Pensions has intentionally misinformed the country. There have been different estimates as to what would be required to pay the arrearages of pensions ever since that bill was introduced into Congress. I well remember the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Rice,) not now a member of this House, who had charge of the bill, believed when he first introduced the bill that $15,000,000 would cover the entire sum that would have to be paid under it. Before the bill got through he advanced to $20,000,000. The Commissioner of Pensions at that time thought it would take $25,000,000. Then it got to the astounding sum of $50,000,000. After a little while another estimate was made and it went up to $100,000,000. And so it has been going on and going on, not in arithmetical progression, but in geometrical progression, until the Commissioner told me the other day that it would cost $710,000,000.

Mr. HAYES. I hope the gentleman will permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. ATKINS. I am not the defender of Mr. Bentley. I think he is a worthy officer. I believe he has tried to do his duty. I know nothing of his antecedents, and I care nothing about them. I think he has endeavored to do his duty. So far as I have had any official connection with him he seems to be an intelligent and reasonable gentleman. I cannot, however, give you the reasons why these various sums have been estimated. I simply give you the facts in order that they may go to the country.

Mr. HAYES. I hope the gentleman will permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. ATKINS. I do it without a particle of malice.

And now, sir, I wish to say one word more. I did not know when I made the remarks whether this was a revolutionary pension claim, or one growing out of the war of 1812, or out of the late war. I knew not what it related to, and I made the remarks I have not for the purpose of prejudicing the just claim of any man. I think the Government ought to fail that would refuse to pension its maimed defenders. I think the Government that would not do it ought not to live. Therefore I have uniformly voted for every one, for every measure, for every bill looking to the protection of the disabled and the maimed of the late war. And I shall continue to do so while I am a member. I have no prejudice on the subject. If I cannot, however, be allowed to allude to the enormous sums that are to be appropriated out of the public Treasury without having my motives smirched, as I understood the gentleman from New Hampshire a moment ago, then, sir, I will leave the question to the country and never open my mouth on it again.

Mr. HAYES. What authority have you for making the statement that this will cost $710,000,000? I ask this in justice to the Commissioner of Pensions. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee on what authority he makes that statement.

Mr. ATKINS. I make it on the authority of the Commissioner himself. He told me with his own mouth, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, that it would cost $710,000,000.

Mr. HAYES. I saw the statement going the rounds of the papers, and did not know on what authority it was made.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. Is this the Betsey Elwell case?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 4608) granting a pension to Betsey Elwell.

Mr. FRYE. Well, now, Betsey Elwell is my old lady. [Laughter.] I am very sorry that the gentleman from Tennessee should have seen fit to make a fight over this bill. She is a very worthy and venerable old lady, and has a good claim.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Maine is mistaken. I have made no fight on this bill. I have no objection to it.

Mr. FRYE. All right, then. I am glad to hear it. I have nothing to say except that I hope the bill will pass. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. COFFROTH. I do not know how those extreme calculations are footed up. It is true that the arrears of pensions has cost about twenty-six million dollars. When the bill was passed it was stated that it would require twenty-five or twenty-six million dollars to cover the arrears due the soldiers at that time. But I do not know of any estimate being made that would cover what pensions were yet to be granted. As I said before, you take the 307,000 cases that are pending in the department and grant them pensions at the average rate of the sixty or seventy thousand that have been already allowed, and the total will not amount to over $244,000,000. I will tell my friend from Tennessee who says this large estimate is made, that the Commissioner of Pensions includes in his calculation an estimate of the amount that would be paid if the pensioners would live, I believe, twenty-two years, and he therefore multiplies the annual roll by the number of years and puts that in as arrears. Now I submit to this House that this is not arrears; because, if so, every pensioner who is put upon the rolls and gets his pension can be charged to arrears, and thus continue to swell the estimates in that way. It is a fact also, as developed by our investigations, that the pension-roll does not materially increase. About as many die and are dropped from the roll as are annually added to it, and the annual appropriations for pensions are not any larger now than they were six or eight years ago.

I say, therefore, that $244,000,000 will cover all arrears if every pension applicant gets his pension granted.

Mr. ATKINS. That differs very widely from what the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions estimated two years ago. He estimated that $15,000,000 would cover it all. Now you say it will take $244,000,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that it will require no less than $750,000,000 to pay arrearages of pensions only to soldiers, and claiming the Commissioner of Pensions as authority for the statement, I ask the attention of the House for a few moments to a plain statement of facts. I hold in my hand a very careful computation based on the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, which refutes utterly the fabulous estimate of the gentleman. The Commissioner states, on page 23 of his report, recently published, that there were pending, June 30, 1880, 233,066 original invalid claims. Multiplying this whole number by the average in each case allowed during the year 1880, namely, $733.59, the amount would be just $173,175,656.94. The Commissioner states that there were also pending at the same time, June 30, 1880, 71,631 widows and other heirs' claims. Now, multiply this gross number by the average amount allowed each of this class of claimants during the year 1880, namely, $991.03, it amounts to $70,998,469.93, which, added to the amount for original invalid claims, makes a total of $244,164,126.87, for the whole 307,697 claims, or an average of $793.52, and this is admitting that every one of the 307,697 claims are allowed, though a large number of these cases have been already rejected and a large per cent. more will be if the past is any guide. In his report of 1878 the Commissioner admits that 80,000 of these very cases now counted have been "rejected," "settled," or "disposed of." Besides this, thousands of claims filed under the arrears law were from widows who remarried within one or two years of the death of the soldier, and who would therefore be entitled to only one or two hundred dollars. Thus, unless we trust an excited imagination for our statistics, it is demonstrable that it will require not half nor one-third of the real sum named by the gentleman to meet the requirements of this law; and I desired to place these facts before the House at this time.

Mr. Chairman, I have been surprised ever since I have been a member of this House that when a pension claim comes up it is seldom opposed on the ground that the particular claim before the House is unjust or fraudulent and should not therefore be allowed. Nobody has said that to-day in reference to this claim; but the argument of to-day, as the opposition generally, is based on the ground that it will take a vast amount of money out of the Treasury to pay these just and long-deferred debts of the Government. Yes, it does take a vast amount of treasure to pay the cost of that great and guilty rebellion. But our Government stands so honored and so high to-day among the nations because it has recognized all its obligations to the very spirit as well as the letter of its promise. It holds sacred its debt to the bondholder, which is a just obligation, and its public credit is higher than that of any nation on earth. Our public debt is a vast aggregate, but only reckless repudiators have dared to suggest that it is not to be paid because it is so great. The people of this country are justly proud of their national financial honor.

Now, if there is one debt more than another that is due not only in business honesty but in good faith and honor, it is the debt due to the brave men without whose heroic sacrifices we should to-day have no Congress of the United States, no national Treasury, NO NATION.

The attempt is being constantly made both in Congress and out of it to magnify and exaggerate the amount necessary to pay the pensions due the soldiers of the country. The vast amounts that will be required to carry these pensions for sixty years to come are paraded as the awful burden that the tax-payers of the present have to deal with. At our present rate of growth another half century will give us 140,000,000 of people and it is scarcely necessary for us to go so far into the future to meet trouble.

Mr. Chairman, it is but fair that every pension claim, like every other claim coming before Congress, shall be investigated on its merits. If it is fraudulent or excessive, let it be rejected. If it is just, any plea of inability or pretext of delay is a dishonor to a great government like ours, whose good faith is more than her treasure. Year after year thousands of soldiers broken in health, or maimed, or needy, or suffering, await not the bounty, not the alms, but the honesty, the justice of the Government they served in the hour of its direst need, and year after year they are told that it will make too big a sum to pay them. In the mean time powerful claimants receive their millions, and great corporations grow colossal by the gratuities of guilty legislation. The Government that neglects its needy soldiers adds infamy to peril and represses alike valor and patriotism.

Mr. SPARKS. I am glad that the claim now pending before the committee is one that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] by all rule and all propriety can speak to as well as the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF,] or the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BRIGGS.] It chances to be a pension claim growing out of the war of 1812, and not out of the rebellion. It is eminently just that the relief sought in this bill should be granted. I take pleasure on all occasions in supporting claims like this. It is one which the Commissioner of Pensions cannot well act favorably upon, and that is the point to which I wish to direct my remarks.

Wherever the Pension Office can under existing law pass upon these claims they ought, in my judgment, to remain there and abide its decisions and be kept out of this House. But wherever cases occur in which it cannot do so, then we ought in all meritorious cases to take them up and pass them, regardless of cost. This claim, as I have said, grows out of the war of 1812. The claimant is a very old lady, represented on this floor by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] As the report presents it, it is a case like this. This woman was really the wife of this soldier for a half century, and yet technically according to law was not his wife. The Commissioner of Pensions, as a matter of course, would first require proof of marriage. That could not be furnished in this case. And yet, as regards all the essential elements of a marriage so far as God's law and the spirit of all just human laws are concerned, she was the wife of this man, and as such entitled not only to this pension but to all else due to a wife. Therefore, being a case the Commissioner of Pensions could not act upon and being meritorious, it is one which ought properly and justly to be acted upon here.

But the trouble is that the great body of the cases that come here for relief come as appeals from the Pension Office. This does injustice to the executive administration, and especially to the Pension Office, and I think ought not to be encouraged. On the other hand, in my opinion all cases like this can find adequate relief only by special act of Congress, and hence legitimately belong here.

Now, touching the question of cost of this arrears-of-pensions act, I had much to do with that act. I reported and managed to get through the bill appropriating the money to pay those arrears. They were estimated at that time by the Commissioner of Pensions at $26,800,000, which was the appropriation made. That sum was to cover the arrears of pensions then due, together with an estimate for the coming fiscal year. Now, gentlemen speak of seven hundred or ten hundred millions of dollars incurred by the passage of this act. Mr. Chairman, these figures frighten men, and well they might, if correct; but there is certainly no well-founded basis for them. I do not care what the Commissioner of Pensions may now say on the subject. He evidently has in his mind that the arrears act has prompted a number of persons to apply for pensions who never would have done so without the passage of this law, and bases some wild speculations upon that. Now, I do not suppose that makes any difference. It certainly gives no good foundation for these speculations as to the amount incurred on account of the passage of this act, if it be true. The rule for the Commissioner to act upon is to grant pensions to worthy, meritorious parties; and only to such. And if he will act critically up to that rule it will not cost the Government the sum which has been named or a tithe of the sum to pay them. But however that may be, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, that arrears act was and is simply an act of justice and honesty to the soldier, whatever it may cost.

I am led to believe from my association with the Pension Office, and from such information as I have derived by consulting with the Commissioner and otherwise, that there are perhaps 15 per cent. or more of fraudulent claims allowed and now on the rolls on which pensions are regularly paid. It is very difficult to detect and prevent these fraudulent claims by any means or system that can be devised.

Of course the Commissioner and every good man in the Republic ought to exert all efforts in the direction of preventing them. Every good soldier feels himself degraded if made to stand on a level with a common cheat who is getting a like pension with himself through fraud and villainy. But in our efforts to prevent fraud we must not neglect to do full and complete justice to the honest, meritorious soldiers, their widows and orphans, even though the sum of money required for that purpose strikes us as a large one.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the bill be laid aside and reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. As there are a number of cases reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole at its former sittings, with a view of disposing of them together with the business acted on by the Committee of the Whole to-day, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BLAND. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee before making that motion will yield to me that I may ask consent for the consideration of Senate bill No. 1133, which is upon the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to taking up the bill indicated by the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

MICHAEL HAYNE.

Mr. BLAND. I ask the Clerk to read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 1133) granting a pension to Michael Hayne.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Michael Hayne, a sailor on board of the United States ship Brandywine.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. BLAND. The report is by the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, and is favorable to the application. I ask that the reading of the report be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT,] that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to make a single remark. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that if the committee does not sit longer we will never get through the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that it is in the power of the committee to vote down the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee if it is so disposed.

Mr. BRIGHT. It was in the interest of facilitating business that I moved the committee should rise. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the committee sitting as long as it chooses.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his motion?

Mr. BRIGHT. I do for the present.

Mr. KELLEY. Would it be in order to ask the committee in a very peculiar case to lay aside for favorable report the Senate bill granting a pension to the widow of Rear-Admiral Paulding?

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask unanimous consent that this be done, in view of the peculiar circumstances of the case.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I object to this irregularity. There are cases of merit all around. Let the Calendar be proceeded with in its regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

SOPHIA A. MELSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4255) granting a pension to Sophia A. Melson, introduced by Mr. HENRY, and reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. COFFROTH.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Sophia A. Melson, mother of Minos J. Melson, late private of Company E, First Regiment Delaware Volunteers, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month from the date of the death of her son, the said Minos J. Melson.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4255) granting a pension to Sophia A. Melson, mother of Minos J. Melson, late a private in Company E, First Regiment of Delaware Volunteers, have had the case under consideration, and respectfully submit the following report:

The records of the Adjutant-General's Office disclose that the deceased soldier was enlisted on the 4th day of October, 1861, at Georgetown, in the State of Delaware, in Company E, First Regiment of Delaware Volunteers, to serve three years or during the war, and that he died of wounds received at the battle of Antietam on the 17th day of September, 1862, having lived only about ten hours after being wounded.

The claim of his widowed mother for a pension in consequence of his death has been pending before the Commissioner of Pensions for a number of years, and has been finally rejected on the ground that the deceased did not, while living, contribute to her support. As to this, there is competent proof that the deceased was bound to service for a term of years prior to his enlistment, and consequently could not, during that time, contribute to the support of his mother; that when that service ended he did promise to provide a home for her, and entered the Army with a view to supporting her out of his wages, but that he was mortally wounded at Antietam before he became able to furnish any material assistance to anybody.

The committee further find from the evidence in the case that the claimant is feeble, old, and very poor, unable to earn a living for herself, and without friends to provide for her. They therefore report back the bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

JACOB GELWICKS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 205) granting a pension to Jacob Gelwicks, introduced by Mr. FISHER, and reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. COFFROTH.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jacob Gelwicks, late of Company L, Eleventh Regiment Missouri Militia.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 205) granting a pension to Jacob Gelwicks, serving in Company L, Eleventh Missouri State Militia, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report

That Jacob Gelwicks made application for a pension September 21, 1878, as No. 260604, on account of disability from wound of left leg received at Newark Mouth, August 1, 1862, at which date he was employed as cook for Company L, of Eleventh Missouri State Militia. The camp was surrounded by confederates; he took a musket and was wounded in the fight. David R. Downing and B. F. Snyder, reputable citizens of Knox County, Missouri, testify that they were members of Company L aforesaid; that they gave ammunition to said Gelwicks during the fight; saw him load his gun, and that he was wounded in that battle.

Surgeon I. M. McKin testifies that he was contract surgeon in the employ of a detachment of Union forces, comprising several companies of the Missouri State Militia, during the engagement that occurred August 1, 1862, and in line of his duty was called to attend Jacob Gelwicks, whom he found suffering from severe gun-shot wounds inflicted in the leg and foot, which wounds were of so grave a character as to wholly disqualify him from further use of his limb.

The applicant is indorsed as a truthful man by William McClintock and Jacob S. Nixon, prominent citizens of Franklin County, Pennsylvania, and testifies that the wounds have never healed, causing running sores, discharging most of the time. Being a miller by trade he was totally unfitted to follow his business, and on account of said wound is able to do only light work when sitting down.

The committee, believing that this claim is just, report back the bill with the recommendation that it be passed.

Mr. WARNER. As I understand from the report, this case is not one of an enlisted soldier whose claims come within the purview of the general law; but is one of those cases which must come to Congress for relief, if relief is had; and, as I have before said, in my judgment it is only this class of cases that should come here at all. I agree with my friend from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] and my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] in that respect.

While on the floor, however, I desire to refer to statements made here to-day as to the probable cost of pensions arising under the arrearages act and in consequence of that act. I think the estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions has been misunderstood. I understand him to estimate that the cost for arrearages arising out of that act will be $245,000,000, or at most $250,000,000; that is, the first payment for arrears accruing at the time the pensions under that act are granted will probably amount to this sum. He then adds to that the annual payments afterward to be made, and I doubt not assumes that many of the applications that have been made are made in consequence of the arrearages act. But in making up the sum of $500,000,000 or $700,000,000, as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] the Commissioner of Pensions of course includes the annual payments to be made after the pensions are granted. How far the Commissioner is justified in assuming that the large increase in the number of new claims filed is in consequence of arrearages allowed under the act of 1878 may perhaps be inferred from the fact that the number of claims filed has increased from less than 17,000 in 1878 to over 140,000 in 1880.

Nevertheless, I agree with my colleague [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] that so far as these claims are meritorious and just there should be no question about their payment; and I must say for gentlemen on this side of the House, whether from the North or the South, that I have never yet heard an objection raised against the allowance of any just and meritorious pension claim. All recognize the fact that these pensions constitute a debt, and that all the people of this country, north and south, who in the future are to reap the benefits of this Union, preserved as it was by the patriotism and the sacrifices of the Union soldiers, must discharge that debt in accordance with the contract. But, on the other hand, all are alike concerned in protecting the Government against false and fraudulent claims.

Now, to what extent claims without merit or false and fraudulent are presented and sustained is a question constantly presented to the minds of gentlemen who desire both to do justice to meritorious claimants and at the same time protect the Government. The Commissioner of Pensions, I understand, estimates that 10 or 15 per cent. of pension claims are fraudulent, or at least not deserving. I assume that there are as many as that; I doubt not there is as large a proportion as that of fraudulent and undeserving claims. We know that in almost every community there are those drawing pensions whom the people believe never sustained any disability whatever in the service in the line of duty.

We must come down to the only true grounds on which claims for pensions can be sustained, and that is compensation for actual disability incurred in the service in line of duty. I do not believe that there is a gentleman on this side of the House who will ever question a claim of that kind. Meritorious claims have never been questioned; they have not been questioned to-day. And if we limit the pension-roll to those who have suffered actual disability, in my judgment, the amount for pensions will fall far within the estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. FISHER. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES POLK KEGERRIES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 203) for the increase of pension of James Polk Kegerries, introduced by Mr. FISHER, and reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. COFFROTH.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the pension of James Polk Kegerries, late a private in Company B, Second Pennsylvania (One hundred and twelfth Pennsylvania Volunteers) Heavy Artillery, shall be $24 per month, instead of $18 per month, at which amount he is now pensioned under certificate numbered 47237.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after the 4th day of June, 1874.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 203) granting an increase of pension to James Polk Kegerries, late a private in Company B, Second Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

Claimant was wounded in front of Petersburgh, Virginia, while in line of his duty, on the 17th June, 1864.

First. Gunshot wound of right arm; fracture of humerus at upper third, requiring resection of five inches of the bone; a number of adherent cicatrices; arm shortened three inches and atrophy of muscles; elbow flexed and partially anchylosed.

Second. Gunshot wound of throat; ball entered one inch above the sternoclavicular articulation, passing transversely to right, emerging two and a half inches from point of entrance. The surgeon says, in an extract, of this remarkable case:

"SURGEON-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Army Medical Museum.

"Photograph No. 289. A case of recovery after excision of the humerus for gunshot injury, involving the trachea, clavicle, and shoulder-joint.

"James P. Kegerries, a private of Battery B, Second Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery, aged nineteen years, a robust, healthy man, was wounded at the battle in front of Petersburgh, Virginia, June 17, 1864, by a conoidal ball, which entered three-fourths of an inch below the thysoid cartilage, just to the left of the trachea; passed a little downwards and to the right under the jugular vein, carrying away one of the wings of the trachea, and emerging half an inch above the clavicle three inches from point of entrance; was deflected in its course by hitting the butt of the musket, and again entered in front of the right clavicle two inches from the acromial end, passing through the surgical neck of the humerus, and emerging near the center of the deltoid muscle. He was taken to the field hospital, and marked for an amputation on the following day, but, tearing off the label, he crawled away among the "slightly wounded," and was sent to City Point, where the wound was first dressed three days after the reception, at which time it was found to be filled with vermin; several pieces of bone were extracted. Air passed through the wound in the trachea, and he spat up considerable blood. This wound, however, did well, and healed in about four weeks. In July, 1864, he was admitted to the third division hospital, Alexandria, Virginia, where a number of spiculæ of bone were removed. On January 17, 1865, Surgeon Edwin Bentley, United States Volunteers, excised the head and three inches of the shaft of the right humerus through an incision five inches in length from acromion through the deltoid muscle. Several abscesses formed in the arm, and one on the side two inches below the axilla, and on the posterior boundary of the space, all of which healed readily. He was discharged the service May 29, 1865, the wound of exit being still open. He states that about one year afterward nine fistulous openings discharged, the arm from shoulder to elbow becoming greatly enlarged, and his general health failing rapidly. On December 17, 1867, a sequestrum six inches long was removed by enlarging the orifice through which it pointed. The incision extended from the point of resection to the elbow, the patient being under the influence of nitrous oxide gas. The excised head with a sequestrum of the shaft is numbered 5711, Section I, Army Medical Museum. The specimen and the particulars of the case were contributed by H. W. Sawtelle, M. D.

"Photographed at the Army Medical Museum by order of the Surgeon-General.

"GEORGE A. OTIS,
"Assistant Surgeon, U. S. A., Curator A. M. M."

This soldier has been receiving a pension of $18 per month, and on the 15th of January, 1878, made application for increase of pension on account of increase of disability from said wounds, rendering him unable to perform manual labor, asking for a pension of the second grade. Claim was rejected February 20, 1878, on account of right arm not being amputated at or above the elbow. But the fact that the entire bone has been severed from the arm from the elbow-joint to the shoulder-joint renders this arm totally useless.

Claimant, suffering from constant and severe neuralgic pains in arm and shoulder and increasing disability and failing health, asks that a pension of the second grade be allowed.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. FISHER. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I now renew my motion that the committee rise.

Mr. HAYES. That is right.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SINGLETON] that I understand there are three weeks' business of the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar unacted upon in the House. It is necessary that that business be worked off so that it may go to the Senate. Under the circumstances, I cannot withdraw my motion.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I have a little bill of about three lines I desire to have acted upon now.

Mr. BRIGHT. I would like to accommodate the gentleman if I could; but I cannot yield to him without being equally obligated to yield to others. I must insist upon my motion.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 75, noes 21.

No further count being called for, the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the business on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report sundry bills to the House with the various recommendations.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 6969) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. WINDOM, Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, and Mr. WITHERS.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 6730) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. WALLACE, Mr. BECK, and Mr. WINDOM.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 388) to provide for publishing an edition of Hayden's Atlas of Colorado; and

An act (H. R. No. 7098) making an appropriation for the flooring of the National Museum.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 2131) appropriating money to be used under the direction of the Navy Department to prosecute a search for the steamer Jeannette, of the arctic exploring expedition.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first lay before the House the bills heretofore reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. If there be no objection, the Clerk will now report the first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

House bill No. 3477, for the relief of Carlile Boyd.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Speaker, there are some bills in advance of that.

The SPEAKER. In strict conformity to the rules, these bills should be taken up in the order in which they were reported from the Committee of the Whole; but it has been the practice to consider first those reported with amendments, and afterward those reported without amendment.

Mr. UPSON. I insist that these bills shall be taken up in their order as reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That course will be pursued.

JOSEPH CLYMER.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on the 14th of January last, being the bill (H. R. No. 2705) for the relief of Joseph Clymer, of Texas, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WELLBORN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. MARTHA BRIDGES.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on the 14th of January last, being the bill (H. R. No. 4434) for the relief of Mrs. Martha Bridges, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM E. GERE.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on the 14th of January last, being the bill (H. R. No. 4436) for the relief of William E. Gere, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PIERRE JOSEPH MAIS.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on the 14th of January last, being the bill (H. R. No. 4437) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Pierre Joseph Mais, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GUNTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM REDUS.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on the 14th of January last, being the bill (H. R. No. 4438) for the relief of William Redus, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DAVID W. STOCKSTILL.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on the 14th of January last, being the bill (H. R. No. 554) for the relief of David W. Stockstill, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FISHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES E. MONTELL.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on the 14th of January last, being the bill (H. R. No. 2844) for the relief of James E. Montell, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CARLILE BOYD.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on the 14th of January last was the bill (H. R. No. 3477) for the relief of Carlile Boyd.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was concurred in, the bill, as amended, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARTIN L. BUNDY.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on the 14th of January last was the bill (H. R. No. 3273) for the relief of Martin L. Bundy.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was concurred in, the bill, as amended, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARMER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HENRY WARREN.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on the 14th of January last was the bill (H. R. No. 1047) for the relief of Henry Warren.

The SPEAKER. This bill has been reported from the Committee of the Whole with a recommendation that it be laid on the table.

The bill was laid on the table.

TITLE TO AN ISLAND.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on the 14th of January last was the bill (H. R. No. 936) relinquishing the right of the United States to an island therein named.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering this bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to this matter. The island to which this bill refers is in the Mississippi River, and is overflowed at various seasons of the year. It belongs to that class of public lands granted by the United States to the several States under the swamp and overflowed land act. This island was transferred by the State of Illinois to the county of Randolph, in my district, under and by authority of the act of Congress to which I have referred. This bill is brought forward in the interest, as I understand, of some citizens of the State of Missouri, and it provides, I believe, in terms that the United States shall relinquish all claim to the island. In other words, it is assumed that the Government of the United States has title to this property, when, in fact, all title to it has long since been granted away. With the view of strengthening in some way, directly or indirectly, the alleged title of the present occupant the passage of this bill is sought.

Now, I protest most earnestly against this legislation. The island, as I have intimated, belongs, under an act of Congress, made effective by the Legislature and Governor of the State of Illinois, to the county of Randolph, in that State; and the Congress of the United States has no right to come in now and attempt, either by direction or indirection, to grant that which it does not possess. By the passage of this bill the title to this island will be affected only to the extent of casting a cloud upon it. I have not the authorities at hand at this moment, or I would be able in a few minutes to show that this property has been granted away under existing law. And therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, if I may be allowed to do so, that this bill be passed over until next Friday, so that I may be able to present to this House a full exposition of the facts in the case. I feel confident Congress will be doing an unjust act by the passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that this bill be laid over until next Friday.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall interpose any objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois, and if I consent to the postponement of this bill, I presume it is unnecessary to reply to the speech he has made. I will say, however, that it has been determined by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and by actual survey that this island is west of the main channel of the Mississippi River and, therefore, located in the State of Missouri. If that be true, then the Government of the United States never undertook to convey this island to the county of Randolph, in the State of Illinois. At most, it could only be urged that this legislation would be a work of supererogation, because the Supreme Court of the United States has in divers cases, and particularly in the case of Jones vs. Soulard, which arose in the city of Saint Louis, determined that proprietorship, when bounded by a navigable stream above tide-water, extends to the middle of the main channel.

The gentleman seems to insinuate that there is an effort on the part of the claimant here to procure the passage of this bill without sufficient examination of it. I say to him that this question has been passed upon by at least two committees of this House, and I say further to him that the riparian proprietors on the Illinois side have conveyed all their supposed title to the present claimant, Mr. John R. Boas.

I say further to the House that we seek this legislation because the Government of the United States has through its officials, the engineer corps, taken charge of the island and converted the property of an individual to its own use. It has had such occupation of the island as to create at least a sort of color of title and prevent the alienation of it on the part of the real owner, Mr. Boas.

But, as I said before, I have no disposition to insist upon the present passage of this bill, and am willing that the gentleman from Illinois may take his time, so that he does not delay too long, to procure any testimony, if any he can find, why this bill should not be passed.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent, the bill will go over until next Friday.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy, and I think I will be able by next Friday to show that this bill ought not to be passed.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid over.

MARK WALKER.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 249) for the relief of Mark Walker.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to substitute Senate bill No. 2, a bill which has passed the Senate unanimously, and is in exactly the same words and language as this bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the purport of the proposition?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes a request requiring unanimous consent.

Mr. McMILLIN. But what is it in reference to?

Mr. O'NEILL. The pending bill is the one discussed last Friday in the Committee of the Whole House, and was reported to the House. I ask the Senate bill passed last February, one year ago, shall be substituted for the House bill.

Mr. WILSON. Both bills being of precisely the same import?

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the import of it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania states that the Senate bill and the House bill are exactly in the same words.

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes, sir; from beginning to end.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the provisions of law regulating appointments in the Army are hereby suspended for the purpose of this act, and only so far as they affect Mark Walker, late first lieutenant Nineteenth United States Infantry; and the President can, if he so desire, in the exercise of his own discretion and judgment, nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint said Mark Walker, late first lieutenant Nineteenth United States Infantry, to the same grade and rank of first lieutenant held by him on May 13, 1878; and that the said Walker shall thereupon be placed upon the retired list of the Army, provided the same shall be recommended by the retiring board.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to taking up and passing the Senate bill instead of the House bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, this provides for an increase of the retired list which I think ought not to be done. Therefore I object. The House may agree to do it, but it cannot do it by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 19.

So (no further count being demanded) the bill was passed.

Mr. O'NEILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FANNY S. CONWAY.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. No. 1583) for the relief of Mrs. Fanny S. Conway, of Louisville, Kentucky.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask to postpone the consideration of this bill until next Friday. I am satisfied the amount is incorrect.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the bill was passed over.

MRS. ELIZABETH P. PAGE.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. No. 1902) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth P. Page.

Mr. GOODE rose.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit that bill——

Mr. GOODE. I have charge of the bill, and I rose to make a motion in reference to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is bound by parliamentary practice to recognize the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. But the Chair had already recognized me to make a motion to recommit the bill with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair retraces his recognition, then. Under parliamentary law the gentleman will recognize the fact that the Chair should recognize the gentleman from Virginia in charge of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. This comes here reported back from the Committee of the Whole House. I do not know who had any special charge of it.

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair knows who had charge of it. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia, because the Chair was present during a portion of the debate on this bill.

Mr. CONGER. But the Chair will remember that I took some charge of this bill myself in Committee of the Whole, [laughter,] if that gives any right in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the uniform practice is to allow the gentleman having charge of a bill to be recognized to make a motion until the House shall reverse his motion; then it passes to the other side, of course.

Mr. GOODE. Mr. Speaker, I think I can relieve the gentleman from Michigan if he hears me for a moment.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman will yield to me to make a motion——

Mr. GOODE. I intend to make a motion myself in reference to this bill. Since the discussion in Committee of the Whole on last Friday I have received a letter from the widow of Captain H. N. Page, in which she instructs me imperatively——

Mr. CONGER. I object to any discussion. If I have the floor, as I think I have a right to it——

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Virginia will make a motion, the Chair will recognize him in his own right.

Mr. GOODE. Then I make a motion to indefinitely postpone the consideration of the bill. I wish to withdraw the bill, and I want to accompany it with a few words of explanation.

Mr. CONGER. I object to any remarks.

Mr. GOODE. Then I move to recommit the bill to the committee. On that I believe I have a right to be heard.

Now, Mr. Speaker, since the discussion of this bill on last Friday I have received a letter from the widow of Captain Page, in which she instructs me peremptorily to withdraw her petition. If I felt at liberty to consult my own feelings or be guided by my own judgment in this matter I would without hesitation press this bill to a final vote in this House, because I believe her claim to be a perfectly valid one, and the Government is bound to recognize it by every consideration of justice and fair dealing. But I feel constrained, as I have stated, to obey the instructions I have received from this petitioner. The House will readily understand and fully appreciate the motives which have impelled her to this step. Her feelings have been so wounded by the fierce assault made upon the memory of her dead husband that she is no longer willing to furnish any pretext for a renewal of that assault. Her petition would never have been presented here if she could possibly have foreseen the result. She had not the remotest idea that the simple presentation of an humble petition for payment of a just debt by this Government would be seized upon and made a pretext for a rude and violent attack upon the cherished memory of the honored dead or harsh and uncharitable comments upon the character of the southern people. She prefers to relinquish that claim forever and allow the Government to hold in its coffers money fairly and honorably earned by her husband rather than afford any excuse for an attack upon his good name, which she holds more precious than money or even life itself.

Now, sir, with the permission of the House, I want to make a single remark with reference to myself. Since the debate of last Friday it has been charged by republican newspapers throughout the country, and it was intimated in that debate upon the floor of this House, that my object in presenting this petition was insidiously to establish a precedent for the payment of southern war claims.

I want to say to this House and the country that no charge could have been more unjust and more destitute of any foundation whatever. I presented that petition because it was my representative duty to do so after it had been sent to me for presentation. I presented it because I believed the country justly owed the amount of money named to the estate of Captain Page. I presented it because I believed section 3480 of the Revised Statutes to be clearly unconstitutional and void so far as claims of this character are concerned. I presented it because I utterly deny the power of the American Congress to pass any ex post facto law or bill of attainder. I presented it because I did not suppose that a single representative of the American people could be found who would be willing to withhold from this lady money honestly earned by her husband in the service of his country, especially as by that service he had illustrated American prowess and shed additional luster on the American name.

A MEMBER. This is not a southern war claim.

Mr. GOODE. No; as my friend suggests, this is not a southern war claim in any sense. I want to say, since I have occupied a seat on this floor I have never advocated the payment of a southern war claim, properly so called. I advocated a bill to reimburse the College of William and Mary for the destruction of its buildings by Federal troops during the war. I advocated a bill to compensate the trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Seminary in Virginia for the use and occupation of their buildings for hospital purposes during the war; and I am willing to submit it to the candid judgment of all fair-minded men that these two bills could not by any proper construction be placed in the category of southern war claims. Why? Because among all civilized and Christian nations, from time immemorial, works of art, temples of religion, public edifices dedicated to science and learning, have been held too sacred to be subjected to the casualties of war. This custom, so honorable to humanity, so responsive to the higher instincts of our nature, has been so long recognized that it has almost acquired the force of positive law.

I have never advocated the payment of any claim which could properly be called a rebel war claim. I will only repeat on that subject what I have said more than once on this floor, and then dismiss this case so far as I am concerned. I want to repeat what I have said more than once, and I want the House and the country to hear it: The people of the South never did expect and do not now expect that losses incurred by individuals as necessary incidents of the war will ever be reimbursed to them. They went into that war with their eyes wide open, with a full knowledge of all the consequences of failure. They staked everything they had upon the issue of the gigantic struggle. They lost, and they are prepared manfully to accept it as the fate of war. Such is the universal sentiment among the southern people, so far as I understand it.

And now, Mr. Speaker, in view of this declaration, which I make with a full sense of the responsibility resting upon me, I trust that our northern fellow-citizens of all political parties will dismiss their apprehensions on this much-mooted question, and that they will not permit this "gorgon, hydra, chimera dire" of rebel war claims to disturb any longer their dreams or their waking thoughts. I move the previous question. I will withdraw the bill if I am allowed to do so.

Mr. CONGER. I object to withdrawal. I desire to speak to the motion to recommit.

Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia if he says that he never has in this House presented or advocated the payment of war losses or war claims so called, with this statement that he excepts from that, because he does not consider them war claims, two cases he has advocated here, one of them the William and Mary College claim which we all remember, which the country remembers, which was thundered through this land from north to south exciting apprehension and fear in every hamlet in the North of the consequence of passing such a law, and exciting hope and expectation in the hearts of ten thousand men in the South who had war claims in which they were interested. I say I have nothing to say in reply to the remark of the gentleman from Virginia that he has never advocated war claims. Of course we look upon the name of these war claims and war losses differently, and I give the gentleman the full credit for his avowal upon that subject according to his own construction.

But, sir, when the gentleman stands there as the representative and mouth-piece of all southern Representatives on the floor, when he assumes to rise in his place and claims to speak for all southern men here and all through the South, and says that they do not now press, and they never have pressed, war claims properly so called—that they have not done so in every possible combination of language and words, by bills and memorials and petitions, that the human mind can conceive—the gentleman must allow me to question whether he does represent the people of the South, whether he does represent other Representatives of the South on this floor, whether he does represent the millions of people of the South interested in the passage of war claims. If it can be possible that that is a true representation of southern feeling, of the feeling of southern Representatives and the southern people, then, sir, I call upon him and his colleagues of the South to march down to the room of the Committee on War Claims, to gather carts, express-wagons, and wheelbarrows and all the means of transportation——

Mr. GOODE. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. CONGER. I decline to be interrupted now. And I call upon them to bring laborers, porters, broad-shouldered men, there that can bear great burdens and bring out of the Committee on War Claims the thousands and tens of thousands of papers filed there awaiting the action of this House, begging——

Mr. ATHERTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. CONGER. I will not allow it.

Mr. ATHERTON. Then do not make any misstatements.

Mr. CONGER. Well, that is kindly advice and undoubtedly well meant. [Laughter.]

Mr. ATHERTON. It is true, every word of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] declines to be interrupted.

Mr. CONGER. I say that the time has come, if these statements are correct, and if the gentleman does speak for the whole South, that the wagons and the carts and the wheelbarrows should be brought here, and this accumulation of petitions, memorials, bills, and affidavits, and proofs that now fill the pigeon-holes in the room of the Committee on War Claims should be taken away. Yes, sir, I would like to see the procession formed. [Laughter.] I would like to see the Representatives of the South who have presented petitions and memorials and bills favoring the passage of war claims and the payment of war losses take their bundles of papers and march with them away from that committee-room and away from the Capitol. And who would be left out of that grand and solemn procession? [Laughter.] I can myself imagine the whole democratic side of this House in marching order, carrying back to their constituents the petitions and the memorials and the bills and the proofs, marching off to Long Bridge to the music of "Carry me back to old Virginia, to old Virginia shore." [Great laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States have believed, all the people of the North without respect to party do believe and have believed, and in the elections of the past have acted as if they believed, that there were gathered petitions and memorials and proofs of claims representing millions and millions and perhaps hundreds of millions of dollars; and that bills have been introduced asking the favorable action of Congress upon them. Sir, "Goode's Book of Nature" revealed a beautiful world, sky, and earth, and air, and flowers, and sea, and all the beautiful creations spread out before the reader. But GOODE'S proclamation here to-day, if it be believed, will relieve the hearts of millions of people in the Northern States from the fear of the future action of Congress, which has hung over them for years, and which I fear will not be dissipated by Goode's beautiful picture of the yielding and the submission of the southern men to the will of the people, as shown by the withdrawing of these claims.

I want to dwell upon that a little. The exultant feelings of my fellow-members here to-day, if they can only think that my friend from Virginia does represent his brethren on that side of the House, and the ten thousand claim agents who have looked forward to the prospective thousands they would reap from the passage of those claims; their exultant feelings, if they could believe that he represented the views of the southern people, could hardly be imagined.

Now I do not question the sincerity of the gentleman from Virginia. He is impulsive, he is generous; his feelings were so wrought up with the compulsion that was laid upon him to withdraw this favorite case forever from the consideration of Congress, that he was led to consider all other claims of such infinitely minor importance that he felt he could sweep them all away with one wave of his hand. Let that pass.

Let it pass with this request, that every southern Representative here shall rise in his place and say that he too will never more present a war claim from the South, that he too will never advocate the payment of the war losses proper of the South. Sir, there would be a feeling of relief in the minds of the American people that they have hardly experienced since the close of the war, if all the southern Representatives here will assert, as the gentleman from Virginia has asserted, that by the consent of all the southern people all these claims shall be withdrawn once and forever from the consideration of Congress.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONGER. Not now.

Mr. BUCKNER. I just want to know——

Mr. CONGER. I might forget what I want to say about the illustrious leader of the gentleman who seeks to interrupt me just as I am coming to that. If the southern Representatives will only do that, there never will again be an occasion for that venerable man who, though going slowly and gradually down to his grave, has of late days been resurrected and held forth as a sound, well, vigorous, hale old man for the coming Presidential contest of 1884, the venerable Samuel J. Tilden—there never will be occasion for him, in the midst of his coming campaign, to again write that terrible letter which he once sent down to his brethren of the South regarding the payment of war claims, and which was received with clenched teeth and frowning brow, and the silence of despair.

More than republicans would be gratified to have each one of these Representatives of the South rise in his place and say with uplifted hand, "I agree to the declaration of Representative GOODE, of Virginia, in regard to war claims." We may long to see that exhibition, but no other man will rise. Solitary and alone the gentleman from Virginia has made this assertion for the people of the South, and no other man will stand by his side this day and repeat that assertion.

Not even a democrat from the North, leaving out my true friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] who has written his views upon the press of the country and sounded them forth to the ears of a thankful people, not even a democrat from the North will rise and say that. I would be willing to give opportunity for any and all of them to come forward and drop one parting tear over the grave of their buried war claims if I thought one of them would. [Laughter.]

The solitary mourner over that grave of one case alone is my friend from Virginia.

Now, sir, one word on the subject of recommittal, for I had not intended to talk about this other matter. The eloquence of the gentleman from Virginia carried me away, as his eloquence frequently does, to say things I had not intended otherwise to say. In reply to him, and in reply to the beautiful commentary upon my conduct in a paper published in his district, which uses strong terms that some of my friends foolishly thought were not very complimentary to me, let me say that if he will keep these bills away, if he and his friends will not thrust before us continually these bills for the payment of some of the war claims or claims resulting from the rebellion, we shall be as mild and peaceable on this side of the House as it is possible for us to be. But he stirs up the commotion; he brings in a bill which stings the sentiment of Northern men; and when we rebuke him for it in a gentle, gentlemanly, kind, loving way, he turns round and declares we are rude. He assails me for the remarks I made about Mr. Page when he became a traitor—not when he was a valiant sailor and soldier of his country.

I want this bill recommitted. I want the facts of history made good. The gentleman from Virginia said the other day that he had made a mistake in the report which he stated he had prepared. Yet that statement is left in print. The gentleman says that although the report declares Captain Page to have gone into the confederate navy, he did not enter that navy, and the statement is a mistake. I am informed that he went into the Virginia navy after Virginia had seceded, Virginia having a navy of her own. I am informed that he did enter that service—not the confederate service, because Virginia then stood, perhaps, alone in her glory. I am informed that when Virginia turned over her navy and her army to the confederate government, the confederate government did not recognize the worth and the services of Captain Page, and did not make him an officer in the confederate navy. I am informed that the then governor of Virginia, in a message, publicly noticed the slight passed upon the State of Virginia in refusing to recognize Captain Page, one of Virginia's own officers in her own navy, and in declining to give him promotion. I want to know whether these reports are true. I want to know what the facts are about these matters; and it is for this reason I have asked that the bill be recommitted, that the committee may report the facts in this case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague [Mr. BURROWS] the remainder of my hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] to move originally to postpone indefinitely. Subsequently he modified that to a motion for recommittal, and then demanded the previous question, which the Chair recognized, but which the gentleman from Virginia withdrew to enable the gentleman from Michigan to address the House. If this be a correct understanding of the facts, the Chair does not recognize the gentleman from Michigan as entitled to a full hour.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Virginia took his seat and I took the floor. The Chair will remember I made the first motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair also remembers that the gentleman from Virginia had a right to control the bill under parliamentary practice.

Mr. CONGER. So long as he chose to exercise it. But he took his seat, and I took the floor in my own right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia withdrew the demand for the previous question to enable the gentleman from Michigan to speak.

Mr. CONGER. That could not have been pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Virginia who, on concluding his remarks, stated that he demanded the previous question; but he withdrew it in the interest of fair play, to allow the gentleman from Michigan to have the opportunity to reply.

Mr. GOODE. The Chair is entirely correct in his statement. I simply withdrew the demand for the time being, to enable the gentleman from Michigan to make such reply as he deemed was called for by my remarks. I did not intend to yield the floor for any other purpose. The Speaker is correct in saying that I moved the previous question upon my motion. I insist upon the demand.

The SPEAKER. The House can vote down the demand for the previous question if it is the desire of the majority to have more debate.

Mr. CONGER. Well, Mr. Speaker—[cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. It will not facilitate business to attempt to hurry it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan will perceive at once——

Mr. CONGER. The Chair will perceive at once that without a remark the gentleman from Virginia withdrew. The Chair will see at once that when I had made the first motion and by courtesy permitted the gentleman from Virginia to make the motion——

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes that the practice of the House gave the gentleman from Virginia the right to control the bill.

Mr. CONGER. There was not a word said about withdrawing the previous question to hear what I wished to say. It was withdrawn; and I took the floor.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker—[cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Did not the Chair rule that the gentleman from Virginia had moved the previous question?

The SPEAKER. So far as the recollection of the Chair goes, the gentleman from Virginia, when this question came up, was on his feet, but the voice of the gentleman from Michigan was heard first by the Chair. The attention of the Chair being called, however, by the gentleman from Virginia to the fact that he had the control of the bill so long as the House might sustain him, the Chair recognized him in the exercise of that right. The gentleman then submitted his motion so as to make it recommittal instead of an indefinite postponement. He proceeded to address the House, and at the end of his remarks demanded the previous question; but on the part of those about the gentleman he withdrew the demand for the previous question in order to allow the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to take the floor to reply. It was done in the interest, as the Chair supposes, of fair discussion, so that each side might be heard. But the gentleman did not yield the hour to which he was entitled; nor did he yield the control of the bill. [Cries of "Regular order!"] The Chair thinks that is a correct and truthful statement. But the House has its remedy. If the House wants to hear further debate on this subject, all the House has to do is by a majority vote to refuse the demand for the previous question. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. CONGER. I gained the floor by moving to recommit with instructions.

The SPEAKER. That motion the Chair will entertain, but the demand for the previous question must first be submitted to the House.

Mr. CONGER. Then I could not make the motion.

The SPEAKER. That motion is allowed under the rules before or after the demand for the previous question. The Chair, at the proper time, will recognize that motion on the part of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question, and allow my colleague to make some remarks.

Mr. GOODE. I have given the gentleman from Michigan ample opportunity to represent his well-known views on this subject. The object I had in view in making this motion in obedience to the request of Mrs. Page was to withdraw this case from further discussion. I have done what fair-play required. I have given the gentleman an opportunity to be heard; and I insist the whole object I had in view would be defeated by throwing wide open now the gates for bitter, sectional discussion. We do not want it; we want to avoid it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist on his demand for the previous question?

Mr. GOODE. I do.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. GOODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair now recognizes the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I move the bill be recommitted with instructions. I ask to what committee is it proposed by the gentleman from Virginia to recommit it?

Mr. GOODE. To the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a question of order. There is so much confusion in the Hall that gentlemen cannot be heard.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the gentleman will inform me to what rule he refers?

The SPEAKER. To Rule XVII.

Mr. CONGER. Where does the motion to recommit carry this?

The SPEAKER. To the Committee on Naval Affairs, which previously had charge of it. The motion is to recommit, and that is back to the committee from which the bill came before the House.

Mr. CONGER. I move, then, it be recommitted with instructions to report exactly the facts in the case, and if necessary to report any misstatement made.

Mr. COX. I rise to a question of order. Would it be in order to move to lay it upon the table?

Mr. GOODE. I make that motion, to lay it upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair does not mean to cut me off while I am making my motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not intend to cut the gentleman off, and will now hear the gentleman to make his motion. The rules allow that motion to be made after the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. CONGER. But I was stating the motion which the Chair permitted me to make.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not know he was cutting the gentleman off.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to entertain and submit a motion to commit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee; and a motion to lay upon the table shall be in order on the second and third reading of a bill.

Mr. GOODE. I move to lay the whole subject upon the table. I think that ought to be satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the main question has been ordered. Under the rules a motion to commit with or without instructions is in order before or after the previous question. A motion to lay upon the table is also in order. The motion to lay upon the table has precedence of the other motions under another rule.

Mr. COX. That carries everything with it.

Mr. CONGER. I wish now to be put aright on the record in regard to my motion to recommit with instructions. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is in order.

Mr. COX. The motion to lay upon the table cannot be interrupted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is stating his motion.

Mr. COX. I want the rules observed.

The SPEAKER. They will be observed.

Mr. COX. I hope so.

Mr. CONGER. I hope there will be no repetition of the charges of Snarleyow. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman from Michigan will only buy a liver pad I will be happy. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I can wear the gentleman without any inconvenience to myself. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan will state his proposition. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] The gentleman has asked to state a proposition, which the Chair will entertain.

Mr. CONGER. I had stated part of my proposition when the Chair interrupted me. I will repeat it again. My motion is to recommit, with instructions to the committee to report the actual facts in regard to the resignation of Captain Page; whether or not he joined the confederate navy; and also to report whether he joined the navy, so called, of the State of Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not certain that he can follow the whole text of that motion in its exact verbiage. The gentleman had better put it in writing.

Mr. CONGER. The reporter has the motion in the exact form in which I made it. My motion is to recommit, with instructions to the committee to report all the actual facts. To report whether he entered the confederate navy, and also whether he entered the so-called navy of Virginia after that State had seceded.

Mr. CALDWELL. I move that the House do now adjourn. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

The SPEAKER. The question will be taken on the motion to lay on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GOODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the subject was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a resolution in relation to the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, in which concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

Mr. CALDWELL. I renew the motion that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 88.

Mr. CALDWELL. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Tellers on the yeas and nays were demanded.

The House refused to order tellers.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

JOHN S. CUNNINGHAM.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, with favorable recommendation, was the bill (H. R. No. 4605) for the relief of John S. Cunningham.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to take up and pass Senate bill No. 286, which is substantially the same as the House bill. It passed the Senate, and is now on the Private Calendar of the House.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIDSON. My impression is that the Senate bill is identical with the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the United States Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to place to the credit of John Scott Cunningham the sum of $1,284.19, being the amount embezzled by his late clerk while at the San Francisco Navy pay office.

Mr. DAVIDSON. It is in substance the same as the House bill. The only difference, I believe, is in the substitution of the full middle name for the initial in the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the question will be on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and being read the third time, was passed.

The SPEAKER. The House bill will be laid upon the table.

Mr. DAVIDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LANGLEY B. CULLEY.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3826) for the relief of the heirs of the late Langley B. Culley.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TALBOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ABSALOM KIRBY, UNITED STATES NAVY.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4607) for the relief of Passed Assistant Engineer Absalom Kirby of the Navy.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

GENERAL LOUIS P. DI CESNOLA.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, with a favorable recommendation, was the bill (H. R. No. 1359) for the relief of Louis P. Di Cesnola, late consul at Cyprus, with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4 strike out the words "and directed;" so that, if amended, it will read: "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY W. JONES.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. No. 2572) granting a pension to Mary W. Jones.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SARAH [MARTHA] M. BIRDSALL.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. No. 3732) granting a pension to Sarah M. Birdsall. The bill was reported with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is to correct a clerical error in the name of the person to whom the pension is granted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask that the same amendment be made in the title as in the body of the bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. DIBRELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BETSEY ELWELL.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. No. 4608) granting a pension to Betsey Elwell.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MICHAEL HAYNE.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation was the bill (S. No. 1133) granting a pension to Michael Hayne.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SOPHIA A. MELSON.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. No. 4255) granting a pension to Sophia A. Melson.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOUSE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. There are but two more bills reported from the Committee of the Whole to be acted on.

The motion that the House adjourn was not agreed to.

JACOB GELWICKS.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. No. 205) granting a pension to Jacob Gelwicks.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JAMES POLK KEGERREIS.

The last bill reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. No. 203) granting an increase of pension to James Polk Kegerreis.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. COFFROTH moved to reconsider the several votes by which pension bills were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the bill (H. R. No. 6969) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, be taken from the Speaker's table, and that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate non-concurred in by the House, and agree to the committee of conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as the managers of the conference on the part of the House Mr. ATKINS of Tennessee, Mr. COBB of Indiana, and Mr. HISCOCK of New York.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WELLS. I move that the bill (H. R. No. 6730) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, be taken from the Speaker's table, and that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments non-concurred in by the House and agree to the committee of conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair names as the conferees on the part of the House, Mr. WELLS of Missouri, Mr. SINGLETON of Mississippi, and Mr. HUBBELL of Michigan.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. COFFROTH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution and bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 146) to provide for printing and distributing the index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semi-monthly;

A bill (S. No. 1573) to provide for the furnishing of certain public documents to soldiers' homes; and

A bill (S. No. 1805) relative to the revolutionary battle-field of Bennington.

RELIEF OF JEANNETTE EXPEDITION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith transmit a communication from the Secretary of the Navy with reference to the dispatch of a vessel for the relief of the Jeannette polar expedition, and commend the recommendations of the Secretary to the prompt and favorable action of Congress.

RUTHERFORD B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 4, 1881.

The message was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD remarks on the interstate-commerce bill. [See Appendix.]

Mr. ACKLEN, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD remarks on the bill (H. R. No. 6094) in relation to customs duties on sugar. [See Appendix.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BUTTERWORTH until next Wednesday, on account of important business.

NICARAGUA CLAIMS.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the Senate bill in relation to the Nicaragua claims. It is recommended by the President and Secretary of State.

Objection was made.

C. THEODOR BURCHARDT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. DWIGHT,] who was not in his place this morning when the Committee on Patents was called, desires to make a report.

There was no objection.

Mr. DWIGHT, from the Committee on Patents, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 6917) for the relief of C. Theodor Burchardt; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAMFORD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 5, 1881.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ANTHONY presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Providence, Rhode Island, favoring the enactment of suitable legislation for the distribution of the balance of the Geneva award to the persons who lost vessels and cargoes by the depredations of the confederate cruisers during the war of the rebellion, and to those who paid extra insurance premiums to underwriters, to protect their property against risk of capture and destruction, or in such other manner as they may think right and equitable; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, presented resolutions of the Board of Agriculture of the State of Illinois, urging Congress to pass a law on the subject of infectious diseases among meat animals in the United States; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ALLISON presented statements of Watt Webb of Boone County, George H. Gardner and John Brown of Polk County, James B. Williams and Robert O. Grayson of Webster County, in the State of Iowa, showing what conveyances have been made in those counties of Des Moines River lands, granted under the act of August 8, 1846, and the present state of the title, who are occupying the lands, the incumbrances thereon, &c.; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of William A. Sharp and others, citizens of Wayne County, Iowa, praying for the passage of a law to prevent the sale of any patented article without there being stamped on it in plain letters "patented;" which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. WITHERS presented resolutions of the common council of Petersburgh, Virginia, asking that a portion of the money appropriated for the improvement of the Appomattox River at Petersburgh may be appropriated to the improvement of the harbor at Petersburgh; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BECK presented the memorial of John F. Teller and others, of Boyd County, Kentucky, and the memorial of Jeremiah Robey and others, of Scott County, Kentucky, soldiers in the late war, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims, and all amendments thereto; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALKER presented the petition of the Chamber of Commerce and business men of the city of Helena, Arkansas, praying that that city be made and declared a port of delivery within the jurisdiction of the New Orleans collection district; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONAS presented the petition of Joseph A. Shakspeare, mayor of the city of New Orleans, praying that that city be granted the use of the marine hospital for the reasons mentioned therein; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PENDLETON presented the memorial of David Downing and others, of Montgomery County, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims, and all amendments thereto; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the memorial of B. F. Hall and others, of Louisville, Kentucky, remonstating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and ajudication of pension claims, and all amendments thereto; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of John W. Rodman and 423 others, citizens of Frankfort, Kentucky, praying for the erection of a public building in that city for the use of the post-office and other Government offices; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GARLAND presented the petition of the Chamber of Commerce and business men of the city of Helena, Arkansas, praying that that city be made and declared a port of delivery within the jurisdiction of the New Orleans collection district; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2144) to vacate, annul, and set aside an act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. McPHERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1953) for the relief of Henry C. Groomes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF EDUCATIONAL BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution to print 1,000 copies of Senate bill No. 133, being the so-called educational bill, has instructed me to report it back without amendment, and to recommend its passage. This printing will cost about six dollars. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That 1,000 copies of Senate bill No. 133, it being the so-called educational bill, be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KERNAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2154) granting an increase of pension to Joel C. Lathrop; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McPHERSON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2155) to define the duties of assistant inspectors of steam-vessels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HEREFORD asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2156) to incorporate the United States Fidelity and Guarantee Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. BUTLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for rivers and harbors for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANSOM, Mr. HARRIS, and Mr. MORGAN submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. ELIZABETH STONE.

Mr. McPHERSON. A few days since the bill (S. No. 2049) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Stone was reported adversely from the Committee on Pensions. I desire the unanimous consent of the Senate to reconsider the vote by which the bill was postponed indefinitely for the purpose of recommitting it to the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and an order will be entered to that effect.

ENGINEER REPORTS.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That the reports of the Secretary of War made at this session of Congress communicating the reports of the Chief of Engineers in reference to the improvement of rivers and harbors be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Have those reports not been printed?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes these to be reports of surveys ordered last year and not included in the annual report.

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir. After consultation I thought the language used in the resolution was broad enough to cover all of them. I believe that the principal report has been printed, or is now in process of being printed, but there is a very large number of reports which have come in since that should be included. The purpose of the resolution is to cover the whole subject, so that every member of the Senate and every member of the House may see in print the reports of the engineers and the opinion of the engineers upon all these questions.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I presume the resolution refers to the special reports which have come in, and they will be printed in one volume for the convenience of Senators.

Mr. RANSOM. I did not mean to include them all in one volume, because that may now be very inconvenient.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that they will be included in the annual report of next year anyway.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have not made myself understood to the Senate. The general reports are in print, as I understand, but now there are sundry special reports made which have been called for by the members of the House and the members of the Senate, and it is to those that I refer. I presume the Senate desires to have those special reports printed in one pamphlet, and not each one separately.

Mr. HEREFORD. It is indifferent whether they are printed together or not.

Mr. RANSOM. My idea has been to consult the convenience of the Printer and the Senate in reference to that matter. I only desire that the reports may be printed in a convenient form for the use of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand the Chief Engineer submits at a certain time all the reports that are prepared, and they are published in one volume. Then there are reports which are made late in the fall on work which was not completed until after the meeting of Congress and the submission of the regular report of the year's operations, and these reports come in just as they are completed, sometimes three or four surveys in one. Each engineer officer generally sends in a report of the special work done by him, and these reports are printed as they come in. They ought not to be held back in order to be printed in one volume. Some of those reports are not here now. They ought to be printed just as they come in, and not be kept for one volume.

Mr. RANSOM. It is just for the reason assigned by the Senator from Missouri that I drew the resolution in the form in which it is. I hope there will be no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the order is agreed to.

YORKTOWN CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. EATON. The joint resolution that I introduced yesterday in relation to the withholding the payment of certain Mexican awards I should like to call up.

Mr. JOHNSTON. There is a joint resolution on the Calendar that I should like to call up. I imagine the resolution of the Senator will cause some debate.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the morning business is through, I ask for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded. If there is no further business for the morning hour——

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator from Connecticut gives me permission to ask the Senate to lay aside temporarily the regular order, in order that I may ask the Senate to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 337) authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government and people of France an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the centennial anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown, Virginia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri [Mr COCKRELL] has demanded the regular order.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask that the regular order be laid aside temporarily to consider that joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It cannot be laid aside temporarily without unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Then I ask unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the regular order be laid aside for the purpose indicated by the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears no objection.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. There ought to be an appropriation accompanying the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will offer an amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I offer from the Select Committee on the Yorktown Centennial Celebration an amendment to the joint resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. If there is to be an appropriation I shall object to the consideration of the joint resolution. We have expended about one hundred thousand dollars for that celebration, and I think that is quite enough to be thrown away on any such object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it is too late now to object to the consideration of the joint resolution. It must be disposed of in some way. The consideration of the joint resolution was entertained by unanimous consent. The Senator from Massachusetts, in behalf of the committee reporting the joint resolution, proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to add:

And for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this resolution, the sum of $20,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. DAWES. It is hardly necessary to detain the Senate with any remarks to enable the amendment to be understood. It is proposed to authorize the Secretary of State to invite the French nation to appear here and take part in this centennial celebration, and it is supposed if they accept the invitation they will send officials here. No one would desire to invite them and then let them pay their own expenses. No Secretary of State would be willing to put himself in the position of having invited them unless he knew he would have the money to expend for their entertainment. It seems highly proper that they should be invited, and if they are invited there is no one, I think, who will question the propriety of furnishing the Secretary with the means of defraying their expenses if they accept the invitation. The propriety of the invitation is so apparent to everybody that the whole thing seems to be carried by the character of the original resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Massachusetts please advise us how much was appropriated last year in the last bill for this purpose?

Mr. DAWES. There was no sum appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. COCKRELL. I mean for this celebration.

Mr. DAWES. There was $100,000 appropriated for the erection of a monument and $20,000 for the general expenses.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, not for general expenses, but the expenses of the celebration.

And this $20,000 makes $140,000. This is, I suppose, to go in the way of furnishing refreshments and for a general jollification.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think that any Secretary of State would put himself in the position of extending an invitation to a foreign nation to be represented on such an occasion as that, without any means of entertaining its representatives when they come. He would not care to inform them in his letter of invitation that they must take care of themselves, and could get quarters at the Riggs House or the Arlington on reasonable terms if they applied early.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire that my name be recorded as voting against the amendment and the joint resolution. I am opposed to the whole principle and policy involved in it.

Mr. ANTHONY. As the amendment comes from the committee, I do not wish to interpose any objection to it, but it seems to me that the sum is altogether too small.

Mr. INGALLS. They can ask for more hereafter, if it is found to be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I move to insert after the words "people of France," in the fourth line of the joint resolution, the words, "and the family of General La Fayette." I do not include by name the descendants of the other distinguished French officers who were in that action, because they were here as French officers; they were under the command of their sovereign, at the head of French troops or French vessels, in the performance of their duty in a war which France was waging against Great Britain, and however distinguished their service, or however entitled they may be to the gratitude of the American people, that gratitude is exhibited to them when it is exhibited to the French nation, of which they were the representatives. But La Fayette came over here before the consent of the sovereign of France was obtained; he came as a volunteer in our service, animated by love of liberty, by his regard for the American people. He was an American general, not a French general, during a great part of the revolution, and his high rank, his great ability, his great public virtue render his case an exceptional one as compared with all the other foreigners who came either as volunteers in our Army or for any other purpose during the revolutionary war.

I believe that the monument ordered by the Continental Congress after the close of the war to General La Fayette has never been built; if I am not mistaken no measures have yet been taken toward its construction. Very early after the inauguration of the present Constitution attention was called to the failure to carry out that vote, and it was answered by an economical member that the vote was itself a monument. That is all the monument so far that has been erected.

I hope that the country will at least manifest its gratitude to La Fayette by extending to his descendants this special invitation in commemoration of his great service.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, and it is agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government and people of France, and the family of General La Fayette, an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the centennial anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown, Virginia."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, insisted on by the Senate, to the bill (H. R. No. 6730) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ERASTUS WELLS of Missouri, Mr. OTHO R. SINGLETON of Mississippi, and Mr. JAY A. HUBBELL of Michigan, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, insisted on by the Senate, to the bill (H. R. No. 6969) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. J. D. C. ATKINS of Tennessee, Mr. THOMAS R. COBB of Indiana, and Mr. FRANK HISCOCK of New York, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 203) for the increase of pension of James Polk Kegerries;

A bill (H. R. No. 205) granting a pension to Jacob Gelwicks;

A bill (H. R. No. 249) for the relief of Mark Walker;

A bill (H. R. No. 356) to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas;

A bill (H. R. No. 1359) for the relief of Louis P. Di Cesnola, late consul at Cyprus;

A bill (H. R. No. 2572) granting a pension to Mary W. Jones;

A bill (H. R. No. 2705) for the relief of Joseph Clymer, of Texas;

A bill (H. R. No. 3273) for the relief of Martin L. Bundy;

A bill (H. R. No. 3732) granting a pension to Sarah M. Birdsall;

A bill (H. R. No. 3826) for the relief of the heirs of the late Langley B. Culley;

A bill (H. R. No. 4255) granting a pension to Sophia A. Melson;

A bill (H. R. No. 4436) for the relief of William E. Gere;

A bill (H. R. No. 4607) for the relief of Passed Assistant Engineer Absalom Kirby, of the Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 4608) granting a pension to Betsey Elwell;

A bill (H. R. No. 6229) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through certain lands of the United States in Richmond County, New York; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3477) for the relief of Carlile Boyd.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 286) for the relief of John S. Cunningham; and

A bill (S. No. 1133) granting a pension to Michael Hayne.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 1573) to provide for the furnishing of certain public documents to soldiers' homes;

A bill (S. No. 1805) relative to the revolutionary battle-field at Bennington; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 146) to provide for printing and distributing the index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semi-monthly.

MEXICAN AWARDS.

Mr. EATON. I ask that the regular order be laid aside for the purpose of considering Senate joint resolution No. 151.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the regular order be laid aside for the purpose of considering the joint resolution named by the Senator from Connecticut without prejudice to its resumption at the close? The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 151) directing the Secretary of State to withhold payment of certain Mexican awards.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I am very well aware that the matter of the two claims here named, or pretended claims, of citizens of the United States against the Government of Mexico has been before the Senate on previous occasions. Information, however, has been brought to me, so that further than a jury are required to be satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt, I am satisfied that there was gross fraud in those two claims upon the government of Mexico, and I believe it to be the duty of the United States to permit the Government of Mexico to have those claims thoroughly and properly re-examined.

I should not ask the passage or the consideration of the joint resolution to-day but for the reason that there have been already three or four installments distributed by the Secretary of State, and there will be as I understand, unless action is taken, another installment distributed on Monday, or Tuesday, or Wednesday of next week. Therefore, with my view, with my belief that the Government of Mexico has been defrauded, absolutely defrauded by the men having these claims in charge—I do not mean by the attorneys having these claims in charge, but by the men making the claims—it strikes me that it is the duty of the United States to stop the distribution of this money upon these two claims.

I go further and say, that could I have been assured this morning that the distribution would be withheld upon these two claims for two weeks, or until a thorough examination could be made, I should not have called up the joint resolution to-day, but I could receive no assurance even of that character. Therefore I owe it to myself, to my position, to ask the Senate to consider the joint resolution to-day. If the claims are just claims, no injury can result; if the claims are just claims, they will be in the hands of the Secretary of State in bonds of the United States to be distributed hereafter, and no harm and no injury, nothing but a delay in the distribution of these installments, is asked for. I hope the joint resolution will be passed.

Mr. BECK. Who is asking for the passage of the joint resolution?

Mr. EATON. Justice to the Government of Mexico requires it. I have introduced the resolution on my own responsibility as a member of the Senate, believing that gross injustice has been done to a sister government, and believing it to be the duty of the Government of the United States to see to it that her own honor is vindicated in protecting the rights of a sister republic.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I am reluctant to disagree with my friend, the Senator from Connecticut, and yet I am compelled to do so. I think I shall join with him and do all that we can be properly asked to do in order to vindicate the honor and the integrity of our Government and mete out to the Republic of Mexico justice in the fullest degree; but I think the passage of the joint resolution at this time is not well advised and would be hasty. I am not going to express an opinion upon its merits; I do not say that I shall not finally agree in the precise action which the Senator from Connecticut suggests; but I would not do it without affording all the parties the opportunity of being heard, as they certainly have not been.

My recollection is not very distinct, but I am pretty sure that this matter was once referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body, and that committee gave to it a very careful consideration. While there is justice due to Mexico, justice is equally due to our own citizens. If I am right in my recollection, and I rather believe I am, in the investigation of the subject at that time it was proved that these awards had been transferred beyond all doubt to innocent purchasers; that persons innocent of any offense were the parties to whom the payments would be made at the State Department, and not the persons to whom the awards were originally made. I think that was the condition of the case as it then presented itself to the Committee on Foreign Relations. If I am right in my recollection, the committee reported; I do not recollect whether it was by resolution or by bill; for this subject has come upon me by surprise so that I have no opportunity to investigate it, and I am only stating now from my recollection. The committee reported in favor of leaving to the discretion of the Secretary of State what should be done. Whether a resolution to that effect was passed or not, that was the substance of the action of the committee. So it stood.

I have an impression also that the subject was also referred at one time to the Judiciary Committee of this body, who examined it with considerable care, and I believe reported adversely to any action by Congress.

Mr. McDONALD. If the Senator will allow me, the first action of the Judiciary Committee was embraced in section 5 of the act of June 18, 1878, which I will send to the desk to be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. And whereas the government of Mexico has called the attention of the Government of the United States to the claims hereinafter named with a view to a rehearing: Therefore, be it enacted, that the President of the United States be and he is hereby requested to investigate any charges of fraud presented by the Mexican Government as to the cases hereinafter named, and if he shall be of the opinion that the honor of the United States, the principles of public law, or considerations of justice and equity require that the awards in the cases of Benjamin Weil and La Abra Silver Mining Company, or either of them, should be opened and the cases retried, it shall be lawful for him to withhold payment of said awards, or either of them, until such case or cases shall be retried and decided in such manner as the Governments of the United States and Mexico may agree, or until Congress shall otherwise direct. And in case of such retrial and decision, any moneys paid or to be paid by the Republic of Mexico in respect of said awards respectively, shall be held to abide the event, and shall be disposed of accordingly; and the said present awards shall be set aside, modified, or affirmed as may be determined on such retrial: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as an expression of any opinion of Congress in respect to the character of said claims, or either of them.

Mr. HAMLIN. That expresses, Mr. President, clearly and distinctly what was not only the action of the Judiciary Committee at that time, but the action of the two Houses of Congress. That action was accompanied by a full report from the Judiciary Committee, as my friend from Indiana courteously informs me. It seems to me this section has vested in the Government full and ample powers to investigate this matter and to take such steps as the rights of Mexico may demand and the honor of this country may require. It also provides a proper and just protection to the American citizen who may be the innocent holder of these awards.

If anything further be necessary, I would suggest to my friend from Connecticut that the power is in the Department under the existing law to propose to the Mexican Government a re-examination. If further legislation is required, I think it would be wiser to pass a simple resolution requesting the Department of State to withhold further payment until that investigation can be made, and we can satisfy our minds whether or not further legislation is required. As at present advised I do not see that any is necessary; on a re-examination I might think otherwise. I do not mean to express my opinion upon it now. I simply mean to say that while I hope I shall defend the honor of my country and deal justly by Mexico, I think this measure is rather hasty, and we had better make haste a little more slowly.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to inquire when these claims were allowed by the commission—the claims of Weil and the La Abra Mining Company?

Mr. VOORHEES. Five years ago.

Mr. McDONALD. I made no objection to the resolution being considered at this time, although I do not expect to vote for its adoption. I should be very strongly inclined to favor the suggestion made by the Senator from Maine if any action is taken at this time, and that is that the resolution be referred to some proper committee, as the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the mover of this resolution is chairman, and that in the mean time the State Department be requested to take no steps until further action shall be taken by Congress; but before even that is done, it seems to me we should understand the situation of this case.

The convention entered into between the United States and Mexico in 1868, for the settlement of claims by citizens of the United States against the Government of Mexico, and by citizens of Mexico against the United States, provided for a commission and also provided for an umpire in case of a disagreement between the members of that commission. That commission was to consist of one person representing the Government of the United States and another representing the Government of Mexico, and the minister accredited to the United States from Great Britain, Sir Edward Thornton, was chosen the umpire to determine questions of disagreement between these commissioners.

The treaty contained the ordinary stipulations in such cases, providing that the final determination of these claims before the commission thus constituted should be binding upon both governments, absolutely binding. The two claims now involved in this resolution are some of a large number. They were claims on the part of citizens of the United States against the Government of Mexico. There were others and many claims presented that were disallowed. There were claims presented on the part of citizens of Mexico against the United States that were allowed and operated as a set-off between the two governments for the amounts allowed. The disallowed claims of citizens of the United States have never had a further hearing, although many of them were claims which it was alleged had been improperly disallowed. Attacks have been made on these two claims, and I believe they are the only claims among those allowed that have been directly attacked.

When the act came before Congress to provide for the distribution of the installments of the Mexican indemnity then coming in, the fifth section of that act which has been read by the Secretary accompanying the remarks of the Senator from Maine made an exception as to these two cases. Although the terms of the treaty made the awards final upon the Government of Mexico, yet inasmuch as it was alleged that these two claims had been fraudulently obtained, that they were fabrications, Congress thought it was right to relieve the Governments of the United States and Mexico from the absolute obligation of this convention so far as these claims were concerned, and to empower the administrative branch of the Government to take up and examine them, that being the branch that directly transacts our business with foreign nations, and take such steps as equity and justice, or the honor of the country might require with reference to them.

That act went into force in 1878, and at the last session of Congress the action of the executive department, through the Secretary of State, was laid before Congress, and by this House referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. There was also a bill introduced providing for instituting some kind of legal proceedings with respect to these claims in the Court of Claims, and it also was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The subject of that bill, together with the report of the proceedings of the State Department under the fifth section of the act of 1878, was examined by the Judiciary Committee, and they made their report. I have that report before me.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Judiciary Committee had the whole subject before them the year before. They believed these two claims ought to be re-examined and retried, at the request of the Mexican Government.

Mr. McDONALD. The fifth section has been read.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That government believed they were fraudulent and unjust and asked that certain things be done. The committee thought so; at least, I believed so for one.

Mr. McDONALD. The Judiciary Committee, so far as I remember, did not investigate into the questions of fact any further than to determine that it was proper to relieve the governments concerned, in the way I have stated.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. They had to make an investigation so as to show that there was a prima facie case. The Mexican Government had requested that they investigate far enough to show a prima facie case, otherwise they would not have reported as they did.

Mr. McDONALD. But they embodied the purpose and force of that investigation in the proviso that is attached to the fifth section of the act of 1878:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as an expression of any opinion of Congress in respect to the character of said claims, or either of them.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I would say, if the Senator from Indiana will allow me, that the bill came from the House, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, and I reported the bill. When it came back we adopted that proviso to save any trouble in getting the bill passed.

Mr. McDONALD. That proviso was in the section as agreed to by the Judiciary Committee, and for this very plain and palpable reason: that we determined that this was not a legislative question; that it belonged properly to the executive department of the Government which transacts business with foreign nations, because it had relation to the foreign affairs of this Government in its relations with the Government of Mexico. Of course the Senate, as part of the treaty-making power, would have to pass upon any treaty that might be made; but the executive department initiates treaties. It was held that so far as the Congress of the United States was concerned, it was not a legislative question; and therefore at that time, upon the application that was made to us and the charges preferred, we concluded that it was right and proper to exercise the legislative power so far as to relieve the Government of Mexico from the binding force and effect of the awards and to empower the treaty-making branch of this Government, or that part which inaugurates the negotiation of treaties, to enter into a new convention in respect to these claims if on investigation of the charges it should be thought right and proper to do so. That was the precise case in 1878.

At the last session, as I have already stated, the proceedings of the State Department, as representing the executive branch of the Government in that respect, were laid before the two Houses of Congress, and the bill that I have alluded to was referred to the Judiciary Committee, who again took up and examined these proceedings and made their report upon them, the report which I now hold in my hand. The Secretary of State, in his report to the President, states emphatically that he does not find, whatever the charges of fraud may be in regard to these claims, that the honor of the United States requires them to be reopened as a diplomatic question, as a question for further negotiation and settlement between the two Governments. The Secretary of State says:

I conclude, therefore—

After going on and stating the facts—

that neither the principles of public law nor considerations of justice or equity require or permit, as between the United States and Mexico, that the awards in these cases should be opened and the cases retried before a new international tribunal, or under any new convention or negotiation respecting the same between the United States and Mexico.

With respect to the La Abra Silver mining claim, the Secretary finds that the extent of the charge made by those who profess to represent the Government of Mexico on that subject is that there was an exaggeration of damages, and so all that could be obtained under any circumstances would be a reduction; that is that the commission had found more damages than the facts in the case warranted, and therefore it was in the nature of an application to set aside the award for excessive damages. In the judgment of the Secretary of State that reduction could not be carried to the point of absorbing what was already due on that claim according to the installments then payable, but that enough would remain out of the installments unpaid by the Mexican Government, and therefore no harm could come from distributing that which was already in hand. In regard to the claim of Benjamin Weil, the charge was that it was a fabrication; but the facts set forth by the Secretary of State and presented in his report did not show that it was not in the power of the Mexican Government at the time the investigation was going forward before the commission to have brought forward all the proofs of its allegation. They did not come forward under any claim of newly-discovered testimony. They did not come forward and make the claim that any testimony proper to be considered had been excluded. They made no claim at all except that they insisted that the evidence before the commissioners was not sufficient to justify the award, and that so believing they had introduced no evidence on the other side. They made the same claim before Sir Edward Thornton, but he said he had no right to introduce new testimony; that if they had the testimony in hand when the case was undergoing investigation before the commission it was their duty to have presented it, and they could not come to him with it; that he had nothing to do but to act on the papers certified to him by the commissioners and to the facts that had been placed before the commissioners. Acting upon them, he affirmed the decision of the American commissioner in favor of the claim and against the Mexican commissioner.

After reviewing this report of the Secretary of State, the Judiciary Committee said:

It will be seen from this report, with respect to La Abra mining claim, the principal ground of complaint is exaggeration of damages, and upon that question it does not appear that any fault whatever attaches to the commission before whom it was examined, nor to the referee by whom it was affirmed. It also appears that the Department of State so far passed upon the question of excessive damages as to determine the claimants to be entitled to the installments already paid in, and that the Executive had directed the amounts to which the claimants were thus entitled to be paid over; and while the remaining installments not yet received may be regarded as subject to retention to meet the question of a reduction of damages, it virtually determines the question submitted to the executive department by the said fifth section, so far as that claim is involved.

In regard to the Weil claim, the case presents one of greater difficulty. It appears from the report of the Secretary that this claim is charged by the Mexican Government to be a complete fabrication; that this charge was made before the commissioners at the time it was undergoing investigation. The representative of Mexico claimed to be in possession of evidence then to establish the charge, but declined to introduce it, preferring to rest the case on the evidence introduced by the claimant, but sought afterward to introduce such impeaching testimony before Sir Edward Thornton, the referee, who declined to receive it, holding, and correctly, that no new evidence could be introduced on the hearing before him, and that upon the evidence submitted to the commissioners he could not do otherwise than to affirm the claim.

In the investigation that has taken place in the State Department, under the authority of the fifth section above quoted, no suggestion appears in the report of the Secretary "that the honor of the United States, the principles of public law, or the considerations of justice and equity require that this case should be retried," but, on the contrary, after stating considerations of public policy which would seem to forbid the reopening of the case, the questions of honor, principles of public law, and considerations of justice and equity are referred to Congress to decide. This would involve an investigation by Congress of facts of an international character which, in the opinion of the committee, properly belongs to the executive department, and which it was the intention of the fifth section of the act of June 18, 1878, to leave with the department.

The bill under consideration proposes to withdraw these two claims from the dominion of international jurisdiction and place them before a tribunal organized and existing solely by virtue of the laws of this country, and in this way it would seem designed to avoid the opening up of other questions of complaint that are known to exist on behalf of citizens of the United States whose claims, for various causes, fail to receive favorable consideration by said commission under the treaty creating the commission.

The second article of that treaty bound the two governments absolutely and conclusively by the final awards of the commission and umpire in all cases coming within its provisions; and it would seem right that if it is to be set aside as to any of the claims it ought to be by a new convention, in which provision should be made for doing justice to all claimants.

The reasoning of the Secretary of State against the propriety of such a course as this would seem to be unsatisfactory; but, in the aspect these cases are presented to us, we feel constrained to report back said bill adversely, and recommend its indefinite postponement.

That was the action of the Judiciary Committee, at the last session, upon this question. If further investigation can establish the fact that either of these claims is a fabrication, and can point out a way by which justice may be done to the Government of Mexico, and at the same time guard the rights of our own citizens, very well. These are not the only parties that were involved in this convention. Our citizens whose claims against Mexico were rejected desire a re-examination; and if because Mexico sets up that these claims are fraudulent, we give her an opportunity to prove that, if there can be any way found by which we can possibly set wrong right, in case there is wrong here, I am as willing as any person to do it. But, as far as I am able to judge this case, it is simply a case of a party who stood by claiming to have proof in his hand by which he could disprove a claim set up against him, took the judgment of the court upon the plaintiff's case, lets it go to a final judgment, and then seeks to come in and set it aside.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I introduced the bill into the Senate, by request, to which the Senator from Indiana has just referred, and it was reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary, and being reported adversely it was, under a rule of the Senate, indefinitely postponed. There was neither debate nor a vote taken upon it. At that time I was not satisfied with the action of the Senate taken on that subject. At the same time, I was forced to admit to myself that the bill which had been brought forward and which I had, by request, introduced, was not a sufficient measure for the support of the rights that the Government of Mexico claimed in this case, for that was a bill which referred the adjudication of the question to our Court of Claims. The Government of Mexico had a right to sue a citizen of the United States in the courts of the United States. We have never denied that right to any government. Various suits have been brought and decided in the Supreme Court of the United States where a foreign government has sued our own citizens in our own courts. I understand that the Government of Mexico now desires to bring suit in our courts for the purpose of testing the question whether this award by the Mexican commission ought to be binding upon her, whether she ought to be made to pay into the Treasury of the United States for distribution a sum of money which is predicated entirely upon a fabricated claim against the Government of Mexico, predicated, as the Government of Mexico insists, upon fraud and perjury.

The honorable Senator from Maine says we ought to go slowly in this matter. I grant that, but we ought to go slowly and with sufficient deliberation to arrive at truth and justice; and while one branch of the Government is going slowly, the other branch of the Government ought not to go too fast. We have a law which provides for the distribution of these claims; we have this subject now referred by the President of the United States to the Senate, and by the Senate to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the matter is under consideration now in this body. I am aware of the fact that the Government of Mexico prepared a bill in equity to be filed in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against the claimants, under these awards, setting out that they were void for fraud, that they were void, because they were predicated upon perjury and fraud on the part of the claimants and those interested in the claims at the time of their allowance; but the Government of Mexico would have no advantage under that lawsuit; it could not afford to file the bill, and why? Because the Secretary of State, under what he supposed to be either the authority or the compulsion of the law, has been, and is still paying out this money to the claimants. No judge in the District of Columbia can issue a writ of injunction against the Secretary of State to prohibit him from making the payments; and if the Government of the United States goes on and makes these payments into the hands of irresponsible people, or into the hands of assignees under the idea that they have got a title by bona fide purchase after the award was made, then it is very clear that the Government of Mexico would be engaging only in fruitless litigation if it came into the courts of this country.

Now, what I understand the honorable Senator from Connecticut to desire is, that the Government of the United States shall withhold the further payment and distribution of the funds under these awards until such time as the Government of Mexico shall have a fair opportunity to come into our courts and have it determined whether or not these awards have been based upon fraud and perjury.

I have seen a very full statement of what I understand to be this case as presented by the Government of Mexico, and I think we ought to look at it as it is presented by the Government of Mexico, because that involves a question of national comity, of good faith, if not of honor. The Government of Mexico entered into a convention with the United States, under which two commissioners were appointed and an umpire; these claims were presented along with many other claims against the Government of Mexico; they were decided by the commissioners and by the umpire; and thereupon they became final and conclusive as between the two Governments. Honor, treaty stipulations, good faith require that both Governments should adhere to the adjudication. It was as much our duty to adhere to the adjudication as it was the duty of Mexico to adhere to it, and that makes it a finality so far as diplomatic relations are concerned—makes it a finality so far as concerns the application of the right of the La Abra Silver Mining Company and of Weil against the Government of Mexico. But the Government of Mexico comes in and says, "We understand now, we have discovered, we are able to prove"——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. On that point will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. When was the discovery made of the evidence showing fraud?

Mr. MORGAN. The Government of Mexico went before the umpire after the commissioners had disagreed, as I remember the facts, and then sought to bring before him the testimony; but the umpire ruled, very correctly, that he could only try the case, as far as he was concerned, on the record made and could not reopen it for any purpose at all. They commenced upon this state of facts which I now suggest, and which they suggested, before the time of the final adjudication. They were prevented from having it considered by reason of the fact that the commissioners had decided the question and the jurisdiction had passed into the hands of the umpire, and he was bound by the record then made up and was compelled to decide on such facts as that presented to him.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. How long is it since the award was made?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not remember; but I think as much as five years ago.

Mr. VOORHEES. The award was made by the commissioners in 1875, and the final decision by the umpire in 1876.

Mr. MORGAN. But the Government of Mexico from the date of the final award, and from that time up to the present, has been urging on the United States Government that that government should have some opportunity afforded it of proving that these claims were entirely founded upon falsehood and fraud and perjury; that they had actually no substantial basis at all. From that time the Government of Mexico has been diligent in her efforts to obtain a hearing in one way or another from the Government of the United States. It was in pursuance of that urgent request of the Government of Mexico that the act of June, 1878, was passed. There was a dispute between the Executive Department of the Government and Congress. I do not mean an actual quarrel, but a difference of opinion as to which was the proper policy to settle this question. The Executive Department said that all diplomatic intercourse on this subject was concluded, and therefore they could not consent that diplomacy should be resorted to between the two governments for the purpose of opening that which had been settled. They said the awards were final; that it was due to the umpire, due to both governments, that we should uphold and maintain the conclusiveness of the awards; that the awards should not be attacked for fraud on the part of the commissioners or any dereliction of duty. They considered, and therefore we are bound to consider, so far as diplomatic relations between the two countries are concerned, the awards as final. But, said the President of the United States, "I refer this matter to Congress;" and it came before Congress, and Congress provided in the fifth section of that act a means by which there might be a suspension. In that provision, instead of giving to the Government of Mexico a right to prosecute her suit in our courts in a substantial way, Congress merely referred the question back to the diplomatic authorities again, and here it has been battledoor and shuttlecock between Congress and the diplomatic authorities of this Government as to which was the proper tribunal to settle the matter.

When the bill which I introduced was reported back from the Judiciary Committee that committee did not undertake to decide the question whether Mexico did not have a just claim. That committee never ventured an assertion of that sort; but, on the contrary, they argued that the Court of Claims was not the proper court to try the case, and that was very proper indeed; and they further argued that if the case was opened for further diplomatic correspondence between the two governments, then the citizens of the United States, whose claims had been rejected, perhaps without a hearing before the commission, because they had not been brought in within the proper time fixed for the hearing of such claims, should be also allowed to come in and have a further hearing. That is the condition in which the matter has been left.

Now I will read from the remarks of the committee on this subject:

> The bill under consideration proposes to withdraw these two claims from the dominion of international jurisdiction and place them before a tribunal organized and existing solely by virtue of the laws of this country, and in this way it would seem designed to avoid the opening up of other questions of complaint that are known to exist on behalf of citizens of the United States whose claims, for various causes, fail to receive favorable consideration by said commission under the treaty creating the commission.

That is an objection to the form of proceeding prescribed in the bill.

> The second article of that treaty bound the two governments absolutely and conclusively by the final awards of the commission and umpire in all cases coming within its provisions; and it would seem right that if it is to be set aside as to any of the claims it ought to be by a new convention, in which provision should be made for doing justice to all claimants.
> The reasoning of the Secretary of State against the propriety of such a course as this would seem to be unsatisfactory; but, in the aspect these cases are presented to us, we feel constrained to report back said bill adversely, and recommend its indefinite postponement.

The Secretary of State says:

> While these considerations led to the conclusion that these cases ought not to be made the subject of a new international commission, I was yet of opinion that "the honor of the United States" was concerned to inquire whether in these cases submitted by this Government to the commission, its confidence had been seriously abused, and the Government of Mexico, acting in good faith in accepting a friendly arbitration, had been subjected to heavy pecuniary imposition by fraud and perjury in the maintenance of these claims, or either of them, before the commission.

If the honor of the United States has ever been thus concerned, as the Secretary of State admits in his letter to the President, it is still concerned because we have not discharged that duty. The facts laid before the Secretary of State were so impressive that he could not resist the admission that the honor of the United States was concerned in giving a fair and open hearing in our courts to the Government of Mexico about this business. Sir, he had in his mind no doubt the case of a celebrated dentist who went out to Mexico and robbed that government under exactly similar circumstances of about four hundred thousand dollars. The Congress of the United States did not hesitate, nor did the courts of the United States hesitate after a convention had been concluded, and the award made, and while we were paying out the money as we had assumed to do to Dr. Gardiner on a judgment affirmed by the commission, to set aside the whole fraudulent effort and convince the Government of Mexico and the world that the Congress of the United States was not to be trapped into an outrage by fraud and perjury.

Now, that question which was stated by the Secretary of State, is open to-day, and I insist that the Secretary of State ought to be permitted and authorized, if not compelled, to withhold the payment of any more of this money until the Government of Mexico can come into our courts like any other suitor, and attack the judgment for fraud and set it aside. Her relations with our Government are getting to be, and I am very glad of it, of a very friendly and intimate character, and I hope they will have no reason to believe that any Department of this Government will hesitate for one moment to give them full and ample justice and consideration in our courts when the Secretary of State comes out and in his letter to the President says he is so impressed by these facts that he is obliged to admit that the Government of Mexico ought to have some sort of a show in regard to it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I desire to place this matter before the Senate exactly as it is. Some five years ago an award was made in the cases under discussion——

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, before the Senator from Indiana begins, as the hour of half past one has arrived, I suggest that there be unanimous consent to proceed with this debate.

Mr. VOORHEES. I shall occupy but a few minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The Chair will within half a minute lay before the Senate the unfinished business. The Chair lays before the Senate its unfinished business, which is Senate bill No. 1773.

Mr. BOOTH. Now, Mr. President, I ask that the pending order be laid aside informally, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent is asked that the Senator from Indiana be allowed to conclude his remarks on the measure pending during the morning hour. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. VOORHEES. On the suggestion of friends I am perfectly willing to let this matter go over and let the business of the Senate proceed regularly. I can make the remarks I desire to make hereafter.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to say this before the matter is disposed of, from my place in the Senate: I am bound to say that I think it would be an exceedingly improper thing for the Government, while the debate is pending upon this resolution, to pay out any more of this money.

Mr. VOORHEES. Well, Mr. President, I desire to say in my place in the Senate—I do not know any other place where I would be expected to say it—that I can demonstrate that we have done all that the honor of this Government calls on us to do, and all there is in the world in this matter is the unwillingness of some people about Washington to let this money be paid in the channel marked out by law. When the proper time comes I shall be able to demonstrate that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] asks that the regular order be temporarily laid aside in order to consider the pension appropriation bill. Is there any objection to that? The Chair hears none.

Mr. EATON. I would prefer the Senate should finish the joint resolution we have been discussing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no motion of that kind pending.

Mr. EATON. I make it, and will give the reason in one moment. A certain amount of money will be paid on Monday or Tuesday which ought not to be paid, in my judgment; and therefore I think that this resolution is the proper business of the Senate to-day, rather than any other.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, by law these claims were given to the Executive Department of this Government, where they pended more than two years under a searching investigation, with all the power that was desired or that could possibly have been used, and at the end of that time the money was ordered to be paid by the President of the United States. If in those two years Mexico and the people who are interested for her around here could make no more case than they did in the State Department, I see no reason for such haste as is proposed here, and no reason why the business of the Senate should be set aside to consider that which has been considered for the last five years, during two years of which time full power was given by Congress to the Executive Department to find any reasons against the claims if they could possibly be found, but none were found.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the regular order, to the bill to allot to Indians lands in severalty, being temporarily laid aside to consider the pension appropriation bill? The Chair hears no objection.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, the pending question being on the question of order raised by Mr. TELLER to the reception of the amendment of Mr. WITHERS, which was submitted by the Chair for the decision of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. EATON. With deference to the Chair I suppose I have right to say that after my friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] shall have concluded his remarks on this bill I shall again ask that this joint resolution be considered.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Illinois kindly yields that I may give notice that on Monday next, after the morning business, I will ask the Senate to take up a report made by the Secretary of the Interior in response to a resolution I have offered as to alleged census frauds in South Carolina. I shall ask the Senate to take that up with a view of submitting some remarks on it, which will not occupy longer than thirty minutes, I think.

Mr. WITHERS. If the Senator from Illinois will yield to me, I ask to have reported an amendment which I offer to the amendment now pending, to come in just before the amendment already offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment to his amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2, immediately preceding the amendment, it is proposed to insert:

> All payments of pensions under this act, of persons not on the pension rolls at the time of the passage of this act, shall be made, as far as may be practicable, under the provisions hereinafter contained.

Mr. WITHERS. And then will follow the amendment I have already offered, the object being simply to relieve as far as possible the amendment which I have offered from being obnoxious to the point of order that it is general legislation, the effect of this amendment being to restrict it to this bill.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator from Illinois proceeds I desire to put to him a question—I suppose it will be more agreeable to him to have it put now than after he has begun his remarks—which he will answer or not at his discretion and at such time as he pleases. What I am chiefly interested in in connection with this matter is the great delay which is now taking place in the dealing with applications of persons who I am sure, from my own neighborhood, are honest applicants, who wait many months, sometimes years, without hearing anything from the Pension Office, or without hearing anything but the simple acknowledgment of the receipt of their claim, and then they apply to their Senator or Representative to get the next step taken, and the next, and the next. What I desire to ask the honorable Senator from Illinois is whether he has in his mind any scheme or plan, either by increasing the number of clerks or otherwise, to remove that crying evil? I do not ask him to answer that question now unless he chooses.

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer the question of the Senator from Massachusetts. I have in my mind, and I will develop it before I get through, a very short amendment to the present pension law. I will state it now, however. The remedy for facilitating the business is an increase of the force with able and competent men or examiners, with an increased salary. I think I can demonstrate before I get through that with this improvement the law is ample as it now exists.

Mr. President, I must apologize to the Senate—though it certainly is not my fault that this bill is so long delayed, for the reason that I commenced what little I had to say several days ago, and have not insisted upon being heard nor upon this order being before the Senate, allowing the Senate to take its own course and at the proper time permit me to conclude what I had to say. But before I proceed with the line of argument that I was on yesterday, I must, again, if I can have the ear of the Senate, call their attention to the subject. Some of our friends have warmed up a little on one or two occasions when I have said that I thought one of the great faults was the want of ability. I may have emphasized probably a little stronger than I should have done in reference to the person who administered the law; I merely wished to give my judgment in reference to the law, and whether a new Commissioner with the old law would not be better than the old Commissioner with a new law. The argument I made may have run in that direction. Certainly it is in the direction that the law is sufficient if it is properly administered.

I now desire to call the attention of the Senate to a very contradictory set of statements made. I asked the Senator from West Virginia yesterday in reference to his tables and he said he based them upon the statements of the Commissioner of Pensions. The Commissioner of Pensions first said it would take $25,000,000 to pay the arrears of pensions under the act of 1879. He then said it would take $50,000,000, and afterward it was reported that he said $100,000,000, and now the Senator insists upon the authority of the Commissioner of Pensions that it will take $510,000,000. Since the Senator from West Virginia sought to demonstrate that it would take $510,000,000 another increase has been stated by a member of the Committee on Appropriations in the House of Representatives. I have a right to read from the RECORD, and I will read it:

> I desire to ask this further question. I do not myself believe the Commissioner of Pensions has intentionally misinformed the country. There have been different estimates as to what would be required to pay the arrearages of pensions ever since that bill was introduced into Congress. I well remember the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. RICE,) not now a member of this House, who had charge of the bill, believed when he first introduced the bill that $15,000,000 would cover the entire sum that would have to be paid under it. Before the bill got through he advanced to $20,000,000. The Commissioner of Pensions at that time thought it would take $25,000,000. Then it got to the astounding sum of $50,000,000. After a little while another estimate was made and it went up to $100,000,000. And so it has been going on and going on, not in arithmetical progression, but in geometrical progression, until the Commissioner told me the other day that it would cost $710,000,000.

The Senator from West Virginia made his statement that it would cost $510,000,000, which was based upon mere imagination as to what pensioners would be on the roll hereafter and how long they would live. At least that was my understanding of it; but it went to the country differently. Since that statement the Commissioner of Pensions says it will cost $710,000,000. These statements are brought before the Senate every day, changing every day, for what purpose I cannot divine, but it does seem to me that there is a kind of insanity on this subject of the amount of money that is to be paid to pensioners. The only way to estimate it is according to the amount that is allowed, not on imagination as to what may be allowed. As has been well said in the Senate heretofore, you might just as well accuse one member of the Senate of having violated law and then for that reason estimate that one-third of the remainder would do the same thing. It is not a fair statement to say that because one man or any number of men have committed frauds against the Government, therefore the same number will commit them hereafter. That is to estimate crime according to the number of people that you have already convicted of crime.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Illinois has several times referred to the Senator from West Virginia as giving figures that had no foundation. That was the substance of what he said; I do not say he used those words. Before reading the tables which I submitted the other day to the Senate I said:

> I have some figures, taken principally from the official reports of the Commissioner of Pensions, to which I will call the attention of the Senate.

I think the Senator must have overlooked that fact or he would not have said that the Senator from West Virginia made figures upon his own imagination. They were taken from tables furnished by the Commissioner of Pensions in letters forwarded by the Secretary of the Interior.

The Senator again says that we must not estimate, but we must take the pensions as they have been allowed. The Senator knows that we have appropriated for the expenditures of the Government on estimates, and we are now appropriating for the expenditures for the fiscal year 1882, and so we must estimate. This Government pays all its claims by estimates. We have to estimate in advance and are obliged to do that; and pensions are not alone in that respect.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that last year we paid about twenty-six or twenty-seven millions in round numbers, and this year it is fifty millions to be paid to those on the regular roll. That is the way it goes.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I am correct. If we pay fifty millions for this year and paid twenty-six millions last year, and you have a certain number of pension claims on file and if you allow every one that is on file the total would not amount to $510,000,000 per annum, as the intimation went before the country. It would amount to no such sum.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I did not say annually.

Mr. LOGAN. I am speaking of what the country was led to believe. The country was led to believe, and is now led to believe, from the statements that these enormous amounts are to be paid annually. The Senator shakes his head. I saw a paragraph in a newspaper that called the attention of tax-payers to the fact that they are to pay so much money. It is the estimate that was made running the pensions along, as the Senator said the other day, for sixty years to come. Another fact seems to be strange, that he does not understand altogether, and that is when the arrears of pensions are paid once they are never to be repeated.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me just there to ask him to take into consideration one item in the estimate as to what is the cost of that bill? The passage of that bill has led to the application by a large number of persons to be placed on the pension-roll who otherwise would not have made such application, who had not made application and would not in all probability have made it but for that bill.

Mr. LOGAN. What bill?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The passage of the arrears-of-pensions bill giving arrears of pension is said to have caused a very large increase of applications to be placed on the pension-roll. I call the attention of the Senator to that fact as one of the items properly entering into the estimate of what will be the ultimate cost of the arrears-of-pensions bill.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no doubt that it caused an increase of the number of applications. Nobody has ever questioned that; but that is not the point. The point I was making is that the part of the money which we paid for arrears of pensions last year we never have to pay again. That is the end of it. The part of the money we pay this year on arrears of pensions is not estimated in the next year; you do not pay it over again. After the arrears of pensions have been paid for ten years the ten years' arrears have passed and are not repeated.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator will recollect that a pensioner put on the roll this year continues as long as he lives.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And that has increased the regular roll from $26,000,000 to $50,000,000 this year.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. You put a certain number of pensioners on the roll last year who were entitled to arrears of pensions. You pay those arrears of pensions this year. Now, when you pay the arrears of pensions this year they are never paid again. That terminates it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. So far as arrears are concerned.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly, that is what I am discussing at this point. Then why is it that a Senator will stand up in this Chamber when the passing of the bill and the paying of pension arrears ends one year forever and still aggregate it in the amount that is to come hereafter and make it $510,000,000?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Take, for instance, the year before the arrears-of-pensions bill was passed; it was passed in March, 1879; take the preceding year, and the regular roll was $27,000,000 in round numbers, and it was decreasing annually, but to-day it is about fifty million dollars.

Mr. LOGAN. What pension-roll is about fifty million dollars?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The regular pension-roll.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not the arrears; it is the roll including arrears.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The arrears have caused it, and nothing else caused it, to jump up from $27,000,000 to $50,000,000 in a single year.

Mr. LOGAN. No matter what the cause was, that has been done; that is past. I am not talking about whether the arrears-of-pensions bill should have passed or should not have passed. That is not the question. It has passed; it is the law. The question is how that law shall be administered, and not whether the law is correct or not. Of course the arrears-of-pensions bill increased the amount that was to be paid, because prior to the passage of that bill a pension dated from the time of the application or allowance, but after its passage the pension began from the time of the contraction of the disease or the wound, and that was the reason for the increase.

Those who have been allowed pensions and have received the arrears will get them no more; the arrears are wiped out and do not have to be estimated for any more in those cases. The amount to be estimated for is the pension-roll, including the pensioners who claim without arrears and those with arrears, not estimating that which has been already paid as arrears. Is not that so? Every year as pensions are allowed and the arrears of pensions are paid, that much is cut out of the amount of the estimate. So the Senator will see that in the estimates made they estimate all these pension claims as though the arrears of pensions were to be paid over again. Now, let me go a little further. In the report you have before you it is said there are so many claims pending. What do you call "pending?" Every claim that is there on file is called "pending," is it not?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Those not examined.

Mr. LOGAN. But whether they have been examined or not.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand if a claim has been examined and disallowed it is not called a live claim or a pending claim. After it has been disallowed it is laid aside. That is the way I understand it; but all the pending claims, the live claims, are what are estimated for. The Senate will recollect that the year previous to the pension-arrears act the applications were, in round numbers, 16,000, and the year after that passed the new applications amounted to 141,000, an increase of tenfold almost in a single year.

Mr. LOGAN. The amount involved in the payment of pensions has been placed before the country in excessive figures, for what purpose I do not know. Whether the purpose is to alarm the people of this country, or to bring derision upon the pensioners, I cannot say, and will not say, as I have no information about it. I only say that I think it is a mistake to make these tables and present them to the country when they are not based on anything except the mere imagination of somebody.

I was saying that I thought there was an attempt to cast suspicion upon the pensioners. I tried yesterday to demonstrate by the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions that that was true, because he said in so many words that certain men acting in a semi-judicial capacity could not bring themselves to believe that these statements were true, and this assertion was made without an exception being made in the letter, and therefore I came to the conclusion that the attempt was to cast suspicion upon the pension-roll, including every pensioner who was upon it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senate and the country are desirous of knowing as nearly as they can know what amount of money will be necessary to pay the pensioners already on the roll, to pay the pending claims of pensioners and to pay those claims that will probably hereafter be made. The Senator has criticised the estimates made by the Commissioner of Pensions and the statements made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Now, I do not know whether those statements are correct or not; but I would ask the Senator from Illinois, for the benefit of the Senate and of the country, that after he concludes his criticism of the estimates, he would inform the Senate what amount, in his opinion, will be necessary to pay the pension-roll, those already on the roll, and those that in all probability hereafter will be placed upon it.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator would like to know that.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I would very much, and the country would like to know it.

Mr. LOGAN. Inasmuch as I am not the Commissioner of Pensions my word might not be taken, inasmuch as he is the Commissioner of Pensions and his word is taken, and that word is not, in my judgment, so far as his estimate is concerned, any more worthy of belief than is his idea about the belief of the men who testify in these cases. I will give you a computation that I find in the RECORD of to-day, which I have examined very carefully, which makes the amount very much less than has been stated here, and I will read it for the benefit of the Senate. This estimate has been carefully made by a committee of the House of Representatives, based on the supposed number of claims to be allowed, and has been presented to the House. I cannot vouch for its correctness, but certainly it is nearer the mark than the wild statements being made by others:

| Amount required to make first payments under arrears laws— | |
|---|---|
| Should there be 150,000 claims allowed | $119,028,000 00 |
| Should there be 160,000 claims allowed | 126,963,200 00 |
| Should there be 164,106 claims allowed | 130,221,393 12 |
| Should there be 175,000 claims allowed | 138,866,000 00 |
| Should there be 200,000 claims allowed | 158,704,000 00 |

Now you have it just as I have it, and if there should be 200,000 claims allowed, which is more, so far as the number of claims probably to be allowed, according to the judgment of the Commissioner as to the number that ought to be allowed, the amount would then be $158,704,000. This would be first payment, including arrears; afterward it would be greatly reduced.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The average annual pension now paid is a little over one hundred dollars—one hundred and five dollars and some cents. If that be so, the estimate which the Senator has just read is not correct. He can find that out by simple multiplication.

Mr. LOGAN. If it is not correct, we shall be obliged to the Senator to make up some figures to correct it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No, I will not make any figures. If the average of the annual pension is one hundred and five dollars and some cents, the Senator can satisfy himself that the estimate is not correct by an operation in arithmetic. That is all that is necessary.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know the basis upon which we must all make calculations. I see very different ones are used even by some of our lightning calculators in the Senate and by one great mathematician.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Unfortunately you do not seem to agree with him.

Mr. LOGAN. No, I do not. Now, Mr. President, I desire to carry out what I was saying. These figures are not mine; they are the estimates of men who have made the calculations. I have not made them; I have only examined them to satisfy myself whether a mistake had been made in the computation.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Allow me to ask if that includes anything but arrears? It does not include what is hereafter to be paid, I understand.

Mr. LOGAN. The very thing we are talking about is the arrears of pensions.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator will admit——

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. This includes the amount to be paid on first payment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The after amount?

Mr. LOGAN. The entire amount on first payment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I thought the Senator said the estimate included the arrears and not what hereafter is to be paid.

Mr. LOGAN. That is a matter the Senator can examine for himself and see and discuss. I was called from the line of my argument in reference to these figures for the purpose of trying, at least, to show that, as was said by the Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] yesterday, a misapprehension had gone before the country in reference to this amount. So far as the amount to be paid or not to be paid is concerned, it cuts but little or no figure in the discussion as to whether the bill now proposed is better for examining frauds than the law which at present exists. I only alluded to it for the purpose of trying to have the country understand that there had been a mistake made in this computation.

Now, in reference to what I was saying about the suspicion that is being spread over the country against every pensioner and everybody who has anything to do with allowing pensions, I desire to read again from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, from which it will appear that he characterizes every claim in his office as suspicious, and every man who has anything to do with its examination as unqualified, and yet he appoints them. I read from the Commissioner's report made in 1879, on page 6:

> The large sum of money which the claimant will receive upon the allowance of his claim and the ease with which a fraudulent claim may be manufactured constitute a powerful inducement to dishonest persons to present fraudulent claims, and these occupy the attention of the office in attempting to determine their merits, which ought to be given to the meritorious claims, and thus, by the encouragement of fraudulent claims, the system operates to delay the others to such a degree that in many cases it results in a practical denial of justice. And the pursuit of the necessary medical inquiries is little better than a farce. There are about seventeen hundred surgeons, for the most part neighborhood practitioners, who make the examinations of the claimants in their respective neighborhoods, and report their condition to the Commissioner of Pensions, for which service they are paid by the Government a fee of $1 (formerly $2) for each examination.

Why does he say the medical examinations are little better than a farce? Why does he say they are "mainly neighborhood physicians?" Why does he use that term to make a contrast between those people who have to live in the country and make these examinations and another class of physicians? Is that the reason for it? He attempts here to cast suspicion on the men he has himself appointed. Seventeen hundred surgeons he has appointed to make these examinations, and yet he says these examinations, because made by neighborhood physicians, are not entitled to respect, and are little better than a farce. What did he appoint those physicians for? I say to you, as was well said by the Senator from Ohio when this question was being discussed before, the very thing that this Commissioner advocates is to put your court, if you may call it a court, close to the pensioner to examine him. If that is the reason why fraud should be avoided, the very fact that you have a physician who lives close to the pensioner, who knows his wants, who knows his condition, who knows his character and his habits, is more likely to know the truth about that pensioner than a stranger who knows nothing about his habits or his condition.

Wherever you find this Commissioner speaking of these claims, he casts derision upon the very man whom he appoints himself to make the examination. Why is this? It is done for the purpose, in my judgment, of delaying the pensioner in getting his claim; for I think I can demonstrate, and I will before I am through, that this law which you propose is calculated to delay instead of facilitate the settlement of pension claims.

Then let us see what he proposes in lieu of this. He wants to appoint five hundred and forty more persons, perhaps, at a salary of $3 per day, and then fees to be given to them; and then in the same measure it is provided that he may appoint other surgeons, that he may appoint other boards of surgeons, that he may still increase and multiply the number. Where will he appoint them? Will he appoint them in Washington City and send them out West? Certainly not. Where, then, will he appoint them? He must appoint the neighborhood surgeon or physician, if he does his duty under the law. If so, will not that same appointment that he makes of the neighborhood physician fall under the same charge that he makes here against them now? The neighborhood physicians are not competent, he intimates, to make the examination, and yet he provides for the very same thing being re-enacted into law, and they are to be reappointed by himself.

Let us go a little further with this examination. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asked me a question about facilitating the examination of these cases. I desire to take up that part of the law that I was examining last night, and make an examination of it, and see whether or not it affords sufficient facilities now for the purpose of examining the claims of pensioners, that are now before the Pension Bureau. Yesterday it was stated that one of the objections was that ex parte testimony was taken in these cases. Why is it taken? The ex parte testimony that is taken under cover of secrecy is not the ex parte affidavit of the pensioner and his neighbor. Instead of ex parte evidence in favor of the pensioner, a great part of his evidence must be on record in the War Department, in the Surgeon-General's Office; the evidence of his comrades, the evidence of his family physician, the evidence of his immediate neighbors who know of his habits, of his character, and of his disease are only the ex parte statements.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. All that evidence, except the evidence on record in the War Department, is evidence in the form of ex parte affidavits.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly it is, all except that, but there is the basis for the claim. The basis is the record of this Government, and the other is merely cumulative testimony to support the record, except in cases where the record fails to show a fact that is to be proven by other testimony; but when you talk about ex parte testimony I tell you where the secret, covert, ex parte testimony comes in, instead of being in favor of the pensioner it is that character of testimony which is taken by the special agent in secret against the pensioner; it is where the special agent slips around in the neighborhood and finds some enemy of the pensioner and takes his affidavit, without notice to the pensioner, and files it in the Pension Office. That is the character of the evidence resorted to on the part of the Government against the poor, diseased soldier, and that is filed here without notice to him or without his knowledge in any way whatever.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. This amendment proposes to do away with that which the Senator is now denouncing.

Mr. LOGAN. It proposes to do away with it, but while Senators denounce the ex parte statements in favor of the soldier that are based on the records of the country where he shed his blood or contracted disease for the benefit of this great Republic, and these people tell the tale on both sides, that secret testimony is collected against the soldier and not in his favor. If there have ever been hardships and embarrassments thrown in the way of men it has been in the way of these men in reference to obtaining what they believe is their just due from this Government by having everything thrown in their way. If your Pension Office cannot do the work give them clerks enough to do it. It is the fault of Congress that there is not a sufficient number there employed to do the work as it is required to be done, and it is not the fault of the poor soldier.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No one is blaming the poor soldier.

Mr. LOGAN. Then if no one is blaming the soldier let the suspicions that have been cast on the record of the soldier by your officers be blotted out. Senators claim that there is no power under the law to take testimony except by taking it ex parte.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I have heard no such claim.

Mr. LOGAN. Can the evidence now under the law be taken otherwise than ex parte? It certainly can. I hold in my hand two sections of the Revised Statutes, one of which provides that—

> Any head of a Department or bureau in which a claim against the United States is properly pending may apply to any judge or clerk of any court of the United States in any State, District, or Territory—in the United States, and require witnesses to appear before them and take, not their affidavits, but bring them up and have them examined, have their evidence taken as it would in a chancery case, have it taken by a commissioner, by a court, by a clerk, where both sides may be heard.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. To what section does the Senator refer?

Mr. LOGAN. Section 184 of the Revised Statutes. It applies to claims, and gives authority to any bureau in the Government to do it. A claim for a pension is a claim against the Government, and there is ample power and ample authority to take your testimony before a commissioner, before a court, before a clerk, and take it where both sides can be heard. What more, then, does the laws require than that?

Let me go a little further. If this system that is to be inaugurated is such a grand improvement on the present system why has not the Commissioner of Pensions established this under the law here already in the District of Columbia? Under this very section of the statutes he might have had every pensioner sworn in the District of Columbia before a court; he might have had every witness sworn before a court or before a clerk; he might have instituted cross examinations; he might have brought them before the board of surgeons that are in his office for examination. Why did he not do that, if he suspected any of these cases, for the purpose of demonstrating to the country that the system which he now proposes is one that will be beneficial to the country?

I call the attention of the Senate to section 4775 of the Revised Statutes, which is the law as it now stands:

Examining surgeons duly appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions, and such other qualified surgeons as may be employed in the Pension Office, may be required by him, from time to time, as he deems for the interests of the Government, to make special examinations of pensioners—

Not to make special examinations of applicants for pensions, but of pensioners who are now on the roll; and not only that—or applicants for pensions—

It includes now both the applicant for a pension and the pensioner—

and such examinations shall have precedence over previous examinations, whether special or biennial; but when injustice is alleged to have been done by an examination so ordered, the Commissioner of Pensions may, at his discretion, select a board of three duly appointed examining surgeons, who shall meet at a place to be designated by him, and shall review such cases as may be ordered before them on appeal from any special examination, and the decision of such board shall be final on the question so submitted thereto, provided the Commissioner approve the same.

What do you propose by your substitute? You propose by your substitute that a lawyer and a surgeon shall be appointed in each congressional district; that these pensioners may be brought before them for the purpose of being examined; and that when they are brought before them the evidence shall be heard. You also propose by your substitute to appoint three surgeons in any district at any time the Commissioner of Pensions may deem it important. The law now authorizes him to do the same thing The law now authorizes every pensioner to go before a board that the Commissioner of Pensions shall suggest, in order that the surgeon shall examine him; that they shall hear evidence; that they shall decide the case, either of the applicant or the pensioner; and when they have decided the case it shall be final, unless the Commissioner of Pensions shall reverse it. That is all you propose by your board. By your board of judges, when the case shall be examined, it shall be submitted to the Commissioner of Pensions, and he may agree to it or disagree to it as his mind may incline him. Then sectin 4776 provides—

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to appoint a duly qualified surgeon as medical referee, who, under the control and direction of the Commissioner of Pensions, shall have charge of the examination and revision of the reports of examining surgeons, and such other duties touching medical and surgical questions in the Pension Office as the interests of the service may demand; and his salary shall be $2,500 per annum. And the Secretary of the Interior is further authorized to appoint such qualified surgeons (not exceeding four) as the exigencies of the service may require, who may perform the duties of examining surgeons when so required, and who shall be borne upon the rolls as clerks of the fourth class; but such appointments shall not increase the clerical force of said bureau.

There again, beside the board of surgeons that your Commissioner of Pensions has a right to appoint in every district in the United States under the present law, to call pensioners before them and examine them, try them, test them in every possible way, you have other surgeons who may be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, who shall revise and review the decision of these surgeons, and this surgeon is to be a part of the Bureau of the Commissioner of Pensions. The same thing occurs in your substitute. You do not provide for any final action, except by the Commissioner. He must finally decide whether a pension is allowed or not, but after your board has examined him, after your lawyer has questioned him, after your surgeon has decided his case, it then goes through these men and goes to the Commissioner of Pensions for final action, just as the law is now.

Section 4777 provides that—

The Commissioner of Pensions is empowered to appoint, at his discretion, civil surgeons to make the periodical examination of pensioners which are or may be required by law, and to examine applicants for pensions where he deems an examination by a surgeon appointed by him necessary; and the fee for such examinations and the requisite certificates thereof, in duplicate, including postage on such as are transmitted to pension agents, shall be $2, which shall be paid by the agent for paying pensions in the district within which the pensioner or claimant resides out of any money appropriated for the payment of pensions, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe.

Besides the board of surgeons, besides the special agents that he may detail from his office, besides all these he has a right still to appoint special persons for the purpose of going where he desires, and making examinations of these pensioners and of the applicants. What more, let me ask, must the pensioners undergo? What more critical examination do you desire? What is there now that is wanting? If you can appoint boards of surgeons, special surgeons, special agents, and examine witnesses, call the courts in, the clerk of the court and commissioner, all of these things, for the purpose of giving proper information, what more, in God's name, is the poor pensioner required to go through than is in this law if it is complied with by the Commissioner of Pensions?

I do not wish to be over-tedious in this matter, but I do feel somewhat in reference to it, not for the reasons attempted to be attributed to Senators generally who do not agree with the committee, or with the Senator who proposes the amendment, but because I believe it to be in the interest of the Government, as well as of the pensioners, to have the law executed as it stands without trying new machinery before we know anything about how it will work.

Mr. President, I desire to examine this proposed amendment now in detail. I presume they have all read it very carefully; I presume they understand it very thoroughly; they may understand it better than I, but I desire to give it a fair examination and see what it does propose. I especially call the attention of two Senators who were so desirous of assisting me yesterday to the provisions of this proposed amendment. I ask the Clerk to read the first section of the amendment commencing at line 3, and to read so that Senators can understand it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That there shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, in each of the congressional districts, a pension examiner, who shall be a person learned in the law, and of not less than five years' experience in the practice of his profession. He shall also appoint, in each of said districts, a pension surgeon, who shall have had not less than ten years' experience in the practice of his profession: Provided, That the examiner and surgeon in each district shall be adherents of different political parties: And provided further, That when two or more contiguous districts are situated in a city or other densely populated locality, or when the number of pensioners and pension claimants in contiguous districts is comparatively small, and the Commissioner of Pensions shall be of opinion that a less number of examiners and surgeons than one of each for each congressional district is required, the number of such examiners and surgeons may be reduced by appointing one of each to perform the duties hereinafter prescribed for two or more districts. The examiners and surgeons provided for by this act, before performing any duties thereunder, shall take and subscribe the oath prescribed by section 1756 or by section 1757 of the Revised States, as the circumstances of each person so to be appointed shall render proper for his case. Said examiners and surgeons shall hold their offices at the pleasure of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LOGAN. I now ask the Secretary to read the next section of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the pension examiners and pension surgeons to be appointed under this act shall be authorized to administer oaths to pension claimants and witnesses in any matters pertaining to the prosecution and settlement of claims for pension and bounty-land warrants, or in any inquiry in relation thereto, and, under instructions and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Pensions, shall take the declarations and testimony of pensioners and claimants and of witnesses in such claims. The pension surgeon shall make a medical and surgical examination of such pensioners and pension claimants as he may be required by the Commissioner of Pensions to examine, and make report thereon. The testimony taken by the examiners and surgeons shall be reduced to writing, as nearly as may be in the language employed by the deponents, and shall be subscribed and sworn to by the witnesses. The examiners and surgeons shall together visit each county seat in their respective districts, as often as three times in each year, unless otherwise directed by the Commissioner of Pensions, for the purpose of performing the duties prescribed by this act, and shall also, for the same purpose, visit such other places in their respective districts, from time to time, as they shall be directed by the Commissioner of Pensions to visit; and whenever any pensioner, claimant, or witness, whose presence before the examiner or surgeon is necessary to the proper determination of a matter pending before the Commissioner of Pensions, shall, because of illness or disability, be unable to travel to an appointed place to appear before the examiner and surgeon, the Commissioner of Pensions may direct one or both, as the necessities of the case may seem to require, to visit such pensioner, claimant or witness, as the case may be, and take such disabled person's testimony, or make the required medical examination, and the Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to detail from time to time clerks in his office to aid the examiner and surgeon in any district in the performance of their duties under this act when, in his judgment, the exigencies of the service require such aid, and the person so detailed shall have power to administer oaths and examine witnesses.

Mr. LOGAN. Yesterday the Senator from Rhode Island said he would like to know why this would be more expensive than the manner in which we proceed now, and the difficulties that would be met in the execution of this law. I should like to call his attention now to these two sections. First, you appoint a lawyer who has had five years' experience, and you pay him $3 a day, and he is to visit each county seat in a congressional district three times or more annually. One of the congressional districts in my State has ten counties in it. Three dollars per day is what you propose to pay him, except the costs. You cannot find any lawyer who would perform this duty for $3 a day, taking him from his practice and traveling to each county seat. I do not think you can find lawyers in the State who would perform that duty who are known and recognized as lawyers of any eminence in the profession. How are you going to pay them a sufficient salary? Why, we are going to pay them fees. What kind of fees? You are going to pay them fifty cents for every oath that is administered; you are going to pay them fifty cents for every affidavit.

So with the surgeons. You are going to have a surgeon who has had ten years' practice, and you are going to pay him $3 a day. Then you are going to pay him fees also. What these fees will amount to I do not know, neither will the man whom you appoint know, neither can any one tell. What are these two men to do? One is to be a democrat, and the other is to be a republican. I suppose it is for the purpose of getting up the politics of the district on either side. I cannot see any other reason that there is for the passage of this amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. One might be a greenbacker and the other a socialist, and as the socialistic party is pretty strong in Illinois, quite likely the Senator might be favored with the appointment of one belonging to that party.

Mr. LOGAN. I have nothing to say about who shall appoint. That is not the point. Nor am I discussing their politics; but I only mentioned that fact. Then what else? They are to hold a court three times or more in each county seat. For what purpose? For the purpose of examining pensioners and witnesses, and if a witness is sick they must go to his house. If he lives off thirty miles, it makes no difference, they are to travel to his house. All of these things are to be performed by these two men. They are entitled to employ a clerk, the second section says, who is authorized to swear witnesses and to take down the proceedings. Will any man say that any two persons, a judge or a lawyer and a medical officer, can visit each county seat and examine the pensioners in a State where there are twenty, twenty-two, or twenty-three thousand pensioners? And they may examine all, because the law authorizes it to be done if required.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. There is nothing in the proposed amendment limiting the time to three days. They would be authorized under it to sit as long as necessary.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I was about to ask the Senator from Illinois if he understood that these physicians were confined to one day on each occasion in their visits to county seats?

Mr. LOGAN. No; three days, I understand.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. No; they are to go three times in the course of the year, and they may sit a month or six weeks or two months each time, if necessity requires, as I understand.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. They are to go three times in the course of a year.

Mr. LOGAN. As they shall be directed by the Commissioner. Suppose they go there and sit a whole year in a congressional district at $3 dollars a day, that is what you propose to pay them, I believe, do you believe you can get a good lawyer to do that?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I will answer after awhile.

Mr. LOGAN. I am sorry the Senator is disinclined to answer, but that makes no difference. This is the proposition that you have made. You authorize the Commissioner of Pensions to establish a board of surgeons, besides those in the district, if he desires. Not only that, but you provide that all the authority which these men are to have is to be given hereafter. Do you know what authority the Commissioner of Pensions will give? The Senator from Iowa says he will answer after awhile. I desire him to answer, when he proposes to answer, what authority is given here for the subpœnaing of witnesses? What authority is given here for the bringing of witnesses before this court? What authority is given here for punishing witnesses if they fail to attend? What officer do you provide who shall go and subpœna and summon witnesses? How do you provide for it? How is a poor pensioner to get his witnesses? Do you provide for bringing his witnesses up before this court that they may be sworn? Do you provide for paying his witnesses? Do you provide for any expense on his part? You provide no such thing. Not only that, but with the amendment that was offered this morning every case in the Pension Office that has not been decided will be referred by the Commissioner of Pensions back to the congressional district to be examined by this court that you propose to organize if the Commissioner desires so to do. Is not that true?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I do not know what amendment the gentleman alludes to. That is not the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the bill, and an amendment was proposed this morning that this money should not be paid except under this provision.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I do not know anything about an amendment offered this morning. I am speaking of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I am speaking of it as it stands now, with an amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, that every case that is now in the Pension Office may be sent before this board by the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I do not know anything about the amendment offered.

Mr. LOGAN. Even your own bill will allow that.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. No.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It is no more contemplated that that shall be done than that a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States shall be overruled.

Mr. LOGAN. It is contemplated that they are to act under instructions from the Commissioner of Pensions, and the Commissioner of Pensions may make any set of instructions he pleases under this measure, and you give him the authority to do it, and when he casts a suspicion by his report over every claim in the Pension Bureau why will he not send them before this tribunal that you propose to erect for the purpose of trying these pensioners who have served their country and whose claims are pending?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I will answer in time.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I hope the Senator will.

Whenever any pensioner, claimant, or witness, whose presence before the examiner or surgeon is necessary to the proper determination of a matter pending before the Commissioner of Pensions shall, because of illness or disability, be unable to travel to an appointed place to appear before the examiner and surgeon, the Commissioner of Pensions may direct one or both, as the necessities of the case may seem to require, to visit such pensioner, claimant, or witness, as the case may be, and take such disabled person's testimony, or make the required medical examination.

Does not that contemplate the claims which are before the Pension Office now? That is what it says. Yet the Senator says that it does not mean any such thing. You establish a court without providing for the expense of the pensioner, without providing for the manner of obtaining his testimony, without providing for subpœna, for attachment, for power to bring witnesses, for the hotel expenses, for the expense of the witnesses in any way whatever on the side of the pensioner, and you expect this court to proceed to his examination.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The present law in relation to pensions, which the Senator commends so highly, does not provide for any of those things.

Mr. LOGAN. But this substitute is to be better than the law as it now exists, according to the Senator's theory.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think it is.

Mr. LOGAN. I think it is not. Under the provision as it now exists the pensioner at his home takes his testimony before a neighboring justice of the peace, as he and you have no power to bring him, but you have power if they come voluntarily to examine them and no other power except as your Commissioner may instruct them. I will say to my friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, it will be a gala day when this court, established by Congress for the trial of the pensioner in this country, shall meet in some county seat, and when the clerk whom you provide as one of the court to administer oaths shall go to the door of the court-house and announce, "Oh, yes! Oh, yes! Oh, yes! The pension court is now open for the purpose of examining pensioners to see if they are frauds and are not stealing money from the Government!" Then I should like to see the soldier with one crutch, the soldier with two crutches, the no-legged soldier, the one-armed soldier, the one-eyed soldier, the bowed-down soldier, the poor widow and the poor orphan, all struggling for the door of that court that they might appear to show that they were not frauds upon this mighty Government of ours. Oh, it will be a grand scene. There they will sit on the bench and there they will say to the one-legged soldier, "Did you get your leg shot off in a battle or in a brawl in some saloon?" as my friend from Wisconsin suggested the other day, if it should occur that way.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me a single moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to vote understandingly, and it seems to me that the Senator in discussing this point has omitted to state one thing that impresses itself upon my mind. By the present law, if I am right, the applicant for a pension takes the evidence of his witness at his home, it is sworn to before a justice of the peace, and the proper certificate is annexed, and it is forwarded here. By this bill the witness is to appear before this proposed court. The county in which I live is two or three hundred miles long. That court will sit at Bangor, the most southerly town in the county save one. The witnesses and the parties live one hundred and fifty miles away. Under the present law the applicant could have his evidence taken at home. Now, I ask the Senator if there is no provision made in the bill, how is the soldier to get his witness that one hundred and fifty miles in the same county?

Mr. LOGAN. Just as I was stating a few moments ago, I will say to the Senator——

Mr. HAMLIN. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no provision whatever for him to get his witnesses there unless they are willing to go.

Mr. HAMLIN. This bill, then, is just so much worse for the applicant?

Mr. LOGAN. There is no provision in this bill at all to bring the witnesses of the poor soldier before this court unless he brings them there himself at his own expense. So it is in the State where I live, in some counties, where they would have to travel twenty-five or thirty miles and take their witnesses with them if they could get them to go; but under the law as it stands now, as I said, they may be examined by a surgeon, appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions, who lives in the neighborhood, and he has to be a surgeon of good qualification. The Commissioner of Pensions refuses to appoint surgeons to examine pensioners unless they are surgeons with a good reputation; and in fact there are hardly any of them but what are graduates of a medical college. This is the class usually appointed. He can be examined at home, his evidence can be taken at his home, and it was so provided in the tenderness of the law at the time when the law was passed, when Congress was looking somewhat to the pensioner and not hunting something against him, and they passed a law to accommodate him in the manner of getting his evidence. Why is that right, and why is it just? The majority of the soldiers, as is well known, are poor.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question in regard to the question put to him by the Senator from Maine?

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator would have answered me I should have been much obliged.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The question of the Senator from Maine has not been answered, and I thought——

Mr. LOGAN. I will try to answer it if I can. My ability may not be sufficient, but I will try to do it. I was speaking of the convenience of the soldier at the time when people thought there was something in making it convenient for soldiers, but since we have been treated to so many doses of suspicion here lately about soldiers we try to find some way how not to do it instead of some way how to do it. We try to find some way how not to allow a pensioner his claim instead of finding some way to allow it if he is entitled to it.

As I was stating about the convenience of soldiers, the soldiers generally are poor men. This country was not entirely saved by the wealthy men of the country. The majority of the men who carried their muskets, and whom I stand here to defend to-day, were poor men. The majority of them to-day are not men as well qualified in business matters and in law as some Senators here. They are not the character of men to be dragged thirty or forty or fifty miles at the mere whim or caprice of the Commissioner of Pensions or the surgeon or the lawyer. They are not the men who can afford it; they cannot afford the time. The great majority of them are laboring-men; and yet every inconvenience that can be placed in the road of the soldier in obtaining a pension is tried in this amendment, proposed by the Senator from Virginia at the suggestion of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. WITHERS. I beg the Senator's pardon, it is reported at the suggestion of the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, the Committee on Pensions. I will only change the statement so as to apply to the Committee on Pensions. That is a much higher authority than the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. WITHERS. It is to me, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; I agree to that. It will be found, as I stated, after the pensioner has been told by the passage of this law that he is to be examined, that his old, crippled leg is to be looked at again, that his wounds are to be re-examined, that his disease has got to come under a critical examination again to see if he is not a fraud, after he has been alarmed, then the evidence is taken. What is done with it? Is that a finality? No, sir. When the evidence is taken by this board, or this judge or lawyer, or this surgeon, or this court—I do not know what you call it, therefore I will give it all the chances of a name—it is then to be submitted to these surgeons in the Pension Department, and then to the Commissioner of Pensions again to be re-proved. It goes through all these different processes before it becomes a finality, and before the pensioner can understand whether he is to be allowed to remain on the pension-roll or whether his claim is to be allowed or rejected.

Now, in reference to the evidence, and the Senator from Iowa was going to respond in this particular about witnesses whose evidence could not be obtained. I was speaking of the soldier being required to give his testimony. Why? Because he could obtain it; but where the evidence cannot be obtained then the Commissioner may provide means. If the man is sick or if he is unable to appear, then the Commissioner may provide some other mode. I ask the Senator from Iowa and all Senators who wish this bill to be passed, why not provide it in the bill? Why not put it in your bill that these witnesses shall go at the expense of the Government? It is not so found in the bill. The Commissioner of Pensions is—

Required to make convenient rules and regulations for the making of such medical examinations and for the obtaining of such testimony, and to that end may designate any surgeon convenient to the pensioner or claimant, to make the medical examination, and any officer authorized to administer oaths convenient to the proposed witnesses to take such testimony.

Who may do that? The Commissioner of Pensions. Who knows what rules he may make, or how convenient or inconvenient he may make them for the pensioner, or how expensive?

Sir, by the law now, he can take his evidence at his home or have his examination at his home; let it so remain, and if that is the correct mode of doing it, why change it? If it is not the correct mode of doing it, why put it in this bill that the Commissioner may make rules, &c., for this purpose?

The amendment provides further:

That the Commissioner of Pensions is hereby authorized and required to provide by suitable regulations for organizing and convening boards of three pension surgeons in each pension district, to which appeals may be taken by any pensioner or pension claimant who may feel himself aggrieved by the examination of a single surgeon.

Why do you provide that? If you provide a court for the purpose of deciding these questions and then if it passed from that decision to the Commissioner of Pensions why do you provide another board? Here, after providing for your lawyer and for your surgeon you provide that the Commissioner of Pensions can appoint another board of three surgeons, for what? To appeal to, and then from them to appeal to the surgeons here, then to the Commissioner of Pensions. All these things are provided. Sir, this only smacks of delay. If the soldier fails to take all these steps he may be told that he ought to have appealed to the board of surgeons. Further the amendment provides—

That if any invalid pensioner shall think his pension is not commensurate with the degree of his disability, either because it has been improperly rated by the Commissioner of Pensions, or because the disability for which he was pensioned has increased, or because he has another disability incurred in the service for which he is not pensioned, he may apply to the Commissioner of Pensions for an increase of his pension.

That he can do now. Then it goes on and provides about the rates, &c. Further the amendment provides—

That if, after a pension has been allowed, the Commissioner of Pensions shall have good cause to believe that the same has been procured through fraud or misrepresentation, or for any other reason is of opinion that it ought not to continue, he shall cause the case to be investigated by the examiner or surgeon, or by both acting together, of the district where the claimant or witnesses reside.

That is the law now. He has the power to examine this now by one of his clerks, by a special agent, by a surgeon, by a board of surgeons. He has all that power by the present law.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator is satisfied, then, with that feature?

Mr. LOGAN. I say it is in the present law. Is it not?

Mr. WITHERS. Substantially it is, and many other of the provisions of the amendment are in the present law.

Mr. LOGAN. If there are many other provisions of the law in the amendment, why do you change it? Why not leave the law with these provisions; or is it done merely to make a change? Is it merely to make the country think that you have made entirely a new law when you are copying much of the old one into this amendment in order to carry it through? Is that the object? Then the amendment provides—

That section 4776 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows: "The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to appoint a duly qualified surgeon as medical referee, who shall have been in the active practice of medicine and surgery for at least ten years, who shall perform such duties in the adjustment of pension claims as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Pensions."

You have the medical referee now.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator is satisfied with that feature?

Mr. LOGAN. You have it now; then why put it in here?

Mr. WITHERS. Because we wanted it in.

Mr. LOGAN. The amendment further provides—

That the following fees shall be paid to pension examiners, pension surgeons, and other surgeons and magistrates for services rendered under the provisions of this act in pursuance of the directions of the Commissioner of Pensions:

Taking a declaration in a pension or bounty-land claim, including preparation of the same when required, fifty cents.

For examining any witness, and reducing the testimony to writing, fifty cents.

Making a medical examination of a pensioner or pension claimant, including the taking of such statement from the person examined as shall be required by the Commissioner of Pensions, $2.50.

Actual traveling expenses, and an amount in addition, to be fixed by the Commissioner of Pensions, not exceeding $3, for visiting disabled pension claimants or witnesses as provided in section 2.

To members of boards, organized under the provisions of section 4, their actual traveling expenses and $3 per day each for the time actually in attendance upon such boards.

Such of the above fees as the Commissioner of Pensions may allow shall be paid by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the Commissioner of Pensions shall approve no bills for fees except upon the receipt by him at his office of the testimony and reports showing the performance of the services, accompanied by triplicate bills showing in detail each service for which charge is made.

The Secretary of the Interior shall embody in his annual report a detailed statement of the expenditures under this act during the fiscal year, which shall contain:

First. The names and residences of all persons to whom any money has been paid for services rendered within the year, and for what service.

Second. The names and residences of examiners and surgeons appointed, or who resigned or were dismissed within the year.

Third. The number of meetings and the places thereof of boards of surgeons and the number of examinations made by them.

Fourth. The whole number of pensioners and claimants respectively, examined by the pension surgeons and by other surgeons.

Fifth. The whole number of pension claims settled by admission and rejection respectively.

Sixth. Such other matter as he may deem necessary for a full understanding of the operations of the Pension Office under this act.

Then the last section provides for the repeal of all of these sections of the pension law which I have read that exist now in the old law:

Sections 4744, 4771, 4772, 4773, 4774, 4775, and 4777 of the Revised Statutes are hereby repealed, to take effect June 30, 1880.

Finally, then, they repeal all these sections in which all of these propositions are included which I have stated in the examination of pensioners and in the review of claims.

Mr. President, I said yesterday evening my judgment is that you can find no person to perform this duty who is eligible under this proposed law, a good lawyer with five years' practice, a good surgeon with ten years' practice; that none of these persons will perform this duty for less than $3,000 a year. You make it a burdensome machinery, you make it an expensive system; not only expensive to the Government but inconvenient to the soldier; and in fact by this court starting through the country as you propose to do, it is entirely a change of all the machinery in reference to pensions in this Government from the time the Government began up to the present time.

Why is this change required? Because of frauds outside. If you desire to ferret out frauds, and if that is the object of this amendment, let me suggest that if you will take the class of men that you desire for surgeons and for lawyers under this proposed measure, and give them a fair salary, and put them at the head of your divisions in the Pension Office, and give them a sufficient number of clerks to do the work in that office, you will accomplish exactly what you desire without establishing this kind of cumbersome machinery for the purpose of making a court all over the country to alarm and scare all the pensioners in the country. Why not ferret out frauds as they do in the Internal Revenue Bureau? The way frauds are ferreted out in the Internal Revenue Bureau is by special agents, by examining particular cases, by examining certain persons, by taking a certain character of evidence, and having certain powers vested in the Commissioner of Internal Revenue—the same powers the law as it now exists gives to Commissioners of Pensions; give them the force, all that any one who is competent to perform the duties of that office should require for the purpose of ferreting out frauds in pension claims the same as any other claim.

Mr. President, one word in reply to what was said yesterday about frauds. I do not believe there are so many frauds as are charged. That there are frauds I cannot doubt, although I know of none myself, as there are frauds in all kinds of business. There is no character of business connected with this Government, or any other government, in which there are not frauds perpetrated. Of course there ought to be as few as possible. I will go as far as any man in the Senate Chamber to ferret out frauds, and my desire is that they may be detected. But your machinery will not do it. You have got to ferret out frauds in a different way. You have got to ferret out frauds by making your examinations by agents, and by having qualified agents for that purpose, and by examining the neighbors and people, and you can find them much more readily by examining them by agents than you can by bringing them up before a court. You will find very few men who will go before a court to denounce their neighbor who draws a pension, but the man might quietly tell you of it if you go to him, and let the Commissioner of Pensions be notified, so that he may send his surgeon to examine him or his agent to take testimony.

I believe there are fewer frauds than a great many people imagine. I believe it for the reason I stated yesterday. I believe it because at least two-thirds of the soldiers who went into the field that are alive to-day are suffering under some kind of disability, and the only trouble is that as years pass away and the veil is drawn between the smoke of battle and time we find less consideration for the poor man than we found in the days gone by. It is not so well for a Senator to stand and defend the soldier to-day as it was in years gone by. Even soldiers have got so that they suspect the other soldiers. I am sorry to say it. No public sentiment, however loud it may appeal against the misfortunes of this class of people, will ever cause me to shrink from my duty in their defense when they are assaulted as they have been in reports and in speeches all over the country. In some of the public speeches they have been denounced; in some of the public papers and prints they have been denounced as tramps and mendicants, and it is caught up and considered the public sentiment of the country. Therefore it has got to be that the cry of fraud is against all applicants as the hand of Ishmael was against his fellows.

I remember a case (and I am not stating it by way of criticism of the Pension Office) in a little town where I once resided. A poor soldier, less than a year ago, was on his bed from disease contracted in the Army, and he had not been out of his bed for five years. His neighbors all believed his disease was contracted in the Army. He did not have a dollar in the world. I was sent for by him and I went to his house. He had but a few old pieces of quilts on boards to lie on, and his little daughter only about twelve years old, the only remaining one of his family to stay with him and wait upon him. With all his neighbors believing that he contracted disease in the service, that it came from the measles, because that man did not go to a hospital and did not have the certificate of a hospital surgeon, he was denied a pension. There are plenty of cases of that kind. Suspicion is cast upon that man, and why? Because he staid in his tent and suffered with that disease rather than go to a hospital, and because his comrades or messmates were either dead or where he could not find them, and he has suffered on as he does there in his agony to-day. There are thousands of cases of that kind. There may be some pension claims which are fradulent, but with that man suffering after passing through the war as he did, and believing as I do that he is entitled to a pension, I should have granted him a pension whether there were a surgeon's certificate to prove that he was in a hospital or not. Do those who sympathize with men in that condition want to defraud the Government out of a penny? No, sir, it is not that. It is when you receive six and seven letters from the Pension Office in one solitary case, telling you the same thing every time, without the change of a letter or a word, stereotyped phrases, that the case will be examined by and by—in the sweet by and by we will come to this case and then we will consider it. It is these things that cause men to think that the soldiers are not fairly treated.

More than that, if the Senator from Virginia will inquire as to how many pensions have been granted in the last twelve months, if he will go to the Pension Office and see how many were granted this month and how many the next month, and so on, and see how many cases were examined in January, how many in February, and then how many in October, he may form a correct opinion as to how many could be examined if they would try. When an office can examine so many more claims in one month than it can in any other month, I only suspect that they do not examine them any faster than they are required to.

It has been the attempt for the last two or three years to find some way to prevent the honest pensioner from getting his pension. This way is for the purpose of suspending everything. Organize a little court with a lawyer and a doctor; start them passing around the country; have it placarded as they go, "All pensioners are notified that we are coming; we are on our way to examine them." Herald it through the country that the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives have found a way by which persons cannot get a pension except by passing the severest ordeal, and that will delay them until many shall pass away.

In your very bill you provide no machinery whatever except a doctor and a lawyer and a clerk. You leave all else to the Commissioner of Pensions. He may make rules; he may make instructions; he may make regulations; he may make your law for you. You do not make it, but give him the opportunity. That is, you say to him, "Mr. Commissioner of Pensions, do as you please; go where you please; act as you have a mind to; declare what you want, and have it carried out." That is your proposition, and that is all you propose.

My judgment is just as I stated it this morning, that the old law with a new Commissioner of Pensions would be better than a new law with the old Commissioner of Pensions. Get a man who will execute the law as it stands. Give him enough clerks to do the work, and it is the fault of Congress that he has not got them. Give him that. If he wants men of more capacity for examjners than he has, increase their salary, and then you will have done all that is necessary for the purpose of accomplishing that which you say you propose to do. That is all it wants; that is all it lacks.

I think the Commissioner of Pensions has become morbid on this subject. I will not say that he is insane on this question. He believes every man is a thief who either swears for a claimant or is a claimant. As I stated this morning, his change from $25,000,000 to $710,000,000 shows that there is something wrong in the man; he is either a poor calculator or his mind is troubled on this subject. His figures are increasing a little too fast.

I have no doubt the committee have been led to believe what they say, that this proposed law ought to be enacted. I do not believe it ought to be. I believe it will do harm, and for that reason I oppose it; but as I said I would at a proper time offer to increase the service so far as the clerical force is desired; and if the Commissioner desires others with higher salaries as examiners, I should be willing to do that for the purpose of ferreting out frauds; but to give him this machinery that is asked here, merely for the purpose of an experiment, which will suspend every claim in the Pension Bureau almost until the machinery gets into operation, I am opposed to honestly, because I think it will not be suited to the condition of things, or in any way an improvement, but a hinderance and delay.

One word more and I am done. This measure was attempted to be passed through the Congress of the United States by a kind of outside statement that claim agents were opposed to it. I do not doubt but what they are. I do not know that they are or are not, except what I have heard. I have never spoken to one. I know but one or two of them, and I have not seen those at this session, nor have I for years that I know of; but I should like to ask a question. What difference does it make to the Government whether a soldier employs a man in Washington City to get his claim or whether he employs a man who lives in his neighborhood to get his claim? If the soldier thinks that the man in Washington City can urge his claim stronger than a man who lives at home, he has a right to employ him. Does that employment prove that the man is dishonest? Does that employment prove that the man is acting fraudulently or trying to steal from the Government?

The very machinery that you establish now forces the soldier to employ a lawyer. He will employ one at home, perhaps, when he employs a lawyer there to get up his papers and present them to this court, and they are sent then to the Commissioner of Pensions to be revised, and it will necessitate him to employ another one here to urge his claim forward as fast as possible, for that is about all the duty they perform here. So I cannot understand what figure that cuts in this case. Senators say that claim agents want this, claim agents want that. Has it come to this, that men of intellect, men of mind, men of honor, men of nerve are so afraid of a claim agent that they must cry claim agent every time anything comes up? If a claim agent is for a thing that is right, why should you not vote for it? If a claim agent is against a thing because it is wrong, why should you not vote against it? I cannot understand that kind of argument. I never could understand the argument that is forced into cases, where a reason is given against a bill or for a bill that somebody else is for it or somebody else is against it. I never could understand that process of reasoning. I cannot understand, I know there is nobody in the Senate Chamber who is so contracted in his views as to be guided and governed by a thing of that kind. I say they only throw it in as a kind of make-weight. That must be it, because no man occupying a seat as a Senator would be affected in the least degree by what some individual would say for or against a bill, unless the reason he gave was a good one, no matter what his occupation might be.

Now, sir, having said this much, I apologize to the Senate for having detained it so long. I have stated my views and my reasons for being against this amendment. I do it, as I have said, in the interest of the poor soldier. It certainly is no difference to me, so far as I am individually concerned. Whether you have a thousand surgeons and a thousand lawyers it will cut no figure whatever for me. I presume probably under the proposed system it would be less annoyance to me than under the present one, but what little annoyance it is to me to accommodate the poor men whom I represent by referring their papers is a pleasure. I am willing to do it for them, and I shall be found standing for them whenever I believe there is an attempt made to strike them down by trying to cast reflections upon them. I shall always remember while God lets me live the time when they marched under the banner of this great country, when they were seen in the smoke of battle, in the blaze of day, and in the darkness of night, wending their way along for your peace and safety and for mine.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The Chair will state that the question submitted to the Senate was whether or not the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] some days since was in order under Rule 29. The question of order was raised by the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] This morning the Senator from Virginia modified the amendment before offered. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Colorado as still insisting upon or presenting the question of order?

Mr. TELLER. The modification cannot, under any possible view of the case, affect the question of order. This is as much legislation with the modification as it was without. That is the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desired to know whether the question of order was still pending after the modification.

Mr. TELLER. The question of order is still pending. I do not know whether this discussion is in order. I do not wish to object to it. At the proper time I shall call the attention of the Senate to the fact that that is not the question to be voted on, and I shall be satisfied.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I desire to detain the Senate a short time if it be their pleasure to remain——

Mr. HOAR. I desire, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me, to say that this bill has been discussed on its merits, although the only question before the Senate is the question of order. Having been so fully discussed on one side, it would be ungracious to make a question of order upon a Senator who addresses the Senate in reply; but in order that no personal complaint may be made, I give notice that after the Senator from Iowa has concluded his remarks I shall raise the point.

Mr. TELLER. I would have raised the question at once, but I understood that two Senators desired to speak upon the measure, the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from West Virginia. Therefore I did not raise the question. Now we have gone into it, and of course it is right the discussion should go on till everybody that wants to say his say has got through.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think that all the business of the country which is pressing on our attention ought to be delayed, and many useful measures killed, by an indefinite discussion of this matter, which discussion itself proceeds by unanimous consent; but at the same time I certainly do not wish to raise the question at the present moment; I do not think it would be just.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts under what rule he raised the point of order.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to offer an amendment to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. WALLACE. I submit an amendment as a substitute for the proposition of the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. My colleague has the floor, I believe. I desire to ask my colleague if it would be as agreeable to him to go on on Monday morning. If so I would move that the Senate go into executive session.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If it would not be trespassing on the patience of the Senate, I would prefer going on a little while this evening.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. But of course I am entirely in submission to the wishes of the Senate in that regard. Something has been said in regard to stopping this discussion. I am not very familiar with the rules of the Senate, but I do not very well see how that can be done. If the question of order should be decided and it should be ruled that under the rules of order that question could not be discussed, the bill remains before the Senate, and I do not really know any way—my four years' experience here has not taught me any way—in which the Senate can dictate to a Senator when discussing any bill what line of argument he shall pursue. So if the motion suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts should be offered and it should be ruled that on the question of order the merits of the bill cannot be discussed, yet the pension bill itself remaining is open to discussion, and I suppose we can discuss anything on that bill from this amendment to the state of affairs in Ireland. That is my judgment about it. Now I submit to the Senate whether we ought to go on further to-day or not.

Mr. TELLER rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think the Senator cares about going on to-night. I want to call up a bill that will only take the time to read it. It is the bill (H. R. No. 6062) donating certain lands in Lake County, State of Colorado, to the Veteran Union Association of Leadville, for hospital and burial purposes. I ask the Senate to take it up. It has passed the House, but it requires an amendment here, and it ought to be passed at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the bill mentioned by the Senator from Colorado by its title.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. COKE. I desire to say that I consent to nothing that shall displace the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If a motion were made and carried it would displace the unfinished business; but unanimous consent to consider another bill would not displace it.

Mr. TELLER. I did not ask to make any motion; I only asked unanimous consent. I do not wish to displace the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there unanimous consent to lay aside the pending order for the purpose of considering the bill, the title of which has been read?

Mr. WALLACE. I shall not object to this bill, but I give notice that just as soon as the pension appropriation bill shall be got out of the road, I propose to take up the Post-Office appropriation bill, which is now awaiting the action of the Senate, and I shall not yield the floor when that time comes to anything else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill called for by the Senator from Colorado.

HOSPITAL AND BURIAL GROUND AT LEADVILLE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 6062) donating certain lands in Lake County, State of Colorado, to the Veteran Union Association of Leadville, for hospital and burial purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "Leadville," to insert "its successors and assigns;" so as to read:

That the following-described tract of land, situated in Lake County and State of Colorado, be donated to the Veteran Union Association of Leadville, its successors and assigns, in said State, for the use and purpose of locating thereon a hospital and cemetery.

Mr. McDONALD. The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill back recommending its passage; but I should like the Senator from Colorado to explain to the Senate, if he can, why there is a necessity for so large a grave-yard at Leadville as this would indicate. That was the only objection I had to the bill. It seems to me disproportioned to the size of the place.

Mr. TELLER. One hundred and thirty acres is the amount. I would say that the people of Leadville, by means of a voluntary association for the purpose of raising money by contribution, have erected a building on this ground, which they call the "Veteran Hospital." It is a free public hospital. There are hundreds of people in that country who have to have the privileges of the hospital. There are a great many people going to that country, especially young men, who go there without means, and the moment they are taken sick they are objects of charity. The public charities of that city keep up this hospital. It occupies about thirty acres of this ground. Then a contract has been made with a burial association, that when they get the title they will deed to the burial association for burial purposes the rest of it, and the people there have by contributions fenced it and put paths through the small pine timber, and roads through the land, and built a house on it for the putting of the dead in as they are brought there. It is to be used exclusively for that and nothing else. It is two and half miles from the town. It is out of the way of anybody, and there is nothing in it but the very purpose stated in the bill. The value of the property was absolutely nothing when they took it up, for it was vacant land and could have been taken by anybody. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] knows about it.

Mr. PLUMB. There is no disproportion between the size of the burial ground and the size of the town. There are thirty thousand people there, and the proportion of deaths out there is very considerable. The death rate there is high from various causes. Besides that, there is a very considerable portion of this ground laid off in the shape of small parks, streets, avenues, and so on, that take up a considerable portion of the ground. The ground lies about two and a half miles below Leadville. The land is of no value to anybody, so far as known, except for this purpose; it is of no known value for pasture, no known value for mining, no known value for timber purposes; and while the amount of land may seem to some persons a little large, at the same time I think there is no objection to making a grant of it for the purpose indicated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 203) for the increase of pension of James Polk Kegerries;

A bill (H. R. No. 205) granting a pension to Jacob Gelwicks;

A bill (H. R. No. 2572) granting a pension to Mary W. Jones;

A bill (H. R. No. 3732) granting a pension to Sarah M. Birdsall;

A bill (H. R. No. 4255) granting a pension to Sophia A. Melson; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4608) granting a pension to Betsey Elwell.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 3273) for the relief of Martin L. Bundy; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3477) for the relief of Carlile Boyd.

The bill (H. R. No. 249) for the relief of Mark Walker was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PLUMB. Before that reference is made, I desire to say that that bill is precisely the same as one which has passed the Senate. I therefore move that it be read the third time.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let it lie on the table without reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the committee, objection being made to present action.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 3826) for the relief of the heirs of the late Langley B. Culley; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4607) for the relief of Passed Assistant Engineer Absalom Kirby, of the Navy.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. No. 2705) for the relief of Joseph Clymer, of Texas; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4436) for the relief of William E. Gere.

The bill (H. R. No. 1359) for the relief of Louis P. Di Cesnola, late consul at Cyprus, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill (H. R. No. 356) to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 6229) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through certain lands of the United States in Richmond County, New York, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. SLATER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1773) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HILL of Georgia and Mr. HILL of Colorado submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes; which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT QUINCY.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There is a bill here that I am very anxious to take up, and I ask the permission of the Senate to call it up. It is to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Quincy, in the State of Illinois. If it is passed now, I am satisfied it can be taken up in the House. It is a correlative bill to one that was passed last winter unanimously by the Senate, and it has been reported here favorably by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 1874) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Quincy, in the State of Illinois, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DR. JOHN BLANKENSHIP.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask leave of the Senate to take up and dispose of House bill No. 735.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 735) for the relief of Dr. John Blankenship. It is a direction to the proper accounting officers of the War Department to change the date of muster-out and discharge of Dr. John Blankenship, late assistant surgeon of the Third Regiment Tennessee Volunteers, so as to make it bear date April 24, 1863, the date of his discharge.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, January 11, 1881:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 735) for the relief of Dr. John Blankenship, have duly considered the same, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The bill as it passed the House directs the proper accounting officers of the War Department to change the date of muster-out and discharge of Dr. John Blankenship, late assistant surgeon of the Third Regiment Tennessee Volunteers, so as to make it bear date April 24, 1863, the date of his discharge; and that the said John Blankenship be paid the balance of his salary due him for such service up to April 24, 1863, deducting former payments.

It appears from the data furnished by the Adjutant-General that Dr. Blankenship was appointed an assistant surgeon to the Third Tennessee Volunteers on the 25th of February, 1862. On the 26th of June, 1862, he was sent to obtain medicine for his regiment in Kentucky, and while on this mission he was taken sick with pneumonia, and remained very sick for a long time.

On the 8th of March, 1863, he presented himself to the medical director of his division, after an absence of more than eight months, and was by him ordered to rejoin his regiment for duty. After his arrival there, a field board of examiners was ordered to examine and report upon his efficiency, &c., but instead of appearing before that board and undergoing the required examination, he tendered his unconditional and immediate resignation, which was approved by the medical director, and accepted on the 24th of April, 1863. He had not been regularly mustered into the service; but on the 23d of April, 1869, he was mustered in as assistant surgeon Third Tennessee Volunteers, to date from February 28, 1862, and on May 4, 1869, his discharge of April 24, 1863, was revoked, and he was mustered out and discharged, to date 26th June, 1862, and paid to that date.

Without expressing an opinion as to Dr. Blankenship's qualifications and fitness for the position which he held, your committee deem it but an act of justice to pay him his full salary up to April 24, 1863, the date at which his resignation was accepted, for the reason that his sickness was contracted in the discharge of his official duties, that he returned to his regiment pursuant to the orders of his superior officer, and was borne on the rolls of his regiment as an assistant surgeon until his resignation was accepted. Your committee therefore beg leave to report the bill back to the Senate without amendment, and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN CRAWFORD COUNTY, WISCONSIN.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to take up House bill No. 4596.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4596) authorizing the survey of parts of certain townships in Crawford County, Wisconsin, and making an appropriation therefor.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HILL, of Colorado, on January 19, 1881:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4596) authorizing the survey of parts of certain townships in Crawford County, Wisconsin, and making appropriation therefor, have considered the same, and report thereon as follows:

On the 17th of March, 1880, the Committee on the Public Lands of the House of Representatives made the following report on said bill:

"It was shown to your committee that the lands described were never surveyed by the Government. It also appears that in like cases which have heretofore occurred the surveys have been made by and at the expense of the Government. Your committee refer to the letter of the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office, ask that the same be printed as a part of this report, and recommend that the bill do pass.

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., February 9, 1880.

"SIR: I am in receipt, by your reference, of a petition of 46 residents in townships 9 and 10 north, range 4 west of the fourth principal meridian, in the county of Crawford, Wisconsin, for the resurvey of that part of said townships which lies east of the Kickapoo River, the same not having been actually surveyed in the field by United States deputy surveyor in the year 1843.

"Upon examining the records and file pertaining to the survey of the townships in question I find the following status thereof: On the 12th December, 1850, the register at Mineral Point advised this office of reported frauds in the survey of the townships, whereupon the then surveyor-general was directed to examine into the matter. The inspection of the survey in the field satisfied the surveyor-general of the fraudulent work lying east of the Kickapoo River, in that it had never been subdivided, the field notes being wholly imaginary.

"Accordingly, instructions were given by this office to the surveyor-general, under date of September, 1852, to cause a resurvey of the township to be made to the extent proved to have been fraudulently represented as surveyed.

"The records in this office fail to show that any steps have been taken by several surveyors-general in carrying out the instructions of the 11th September, 1852.

"From the evidence adduced by various county surveyors showing the fraudulent survey of those parts of townships 9 and 10 north, range 4 west, which lie east of the Kickapoo River, in the State of Wisconsin, and corroborated by actual examination in the field under the supervision of the former surveyor-general in 1851, it is manifest that the petition of the residents of Crawford County, Wisconsin, should be granted. Inasmuch as the public surveys have long since been closed in the State, and also the office of the surveyor-general, the resurvey can be made under the direction of the Commissioner of the Land Office, provided he is authorized by Congress to do so, and make the necessary appropriation to defray the expenses of the resurvey, as had been the case in an analogous instance, vide act of February 16, 1877, (United States Statutes, volume 19, page 231,) which authorized the survey of certain townships in Michigan and made an appropriation therefor.

"The cost of the resurvey of said townships is estimated at $750.

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"J. M. ARMSTRONG,
"Acting Commissioner.

"Hon. GEO. C. HAZELTON,
"House of Representatives."

Your committee adopt said House report, and recommend that said bill do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATEN ISLAND RAPID TRANSIT RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the attention of the Senate to House bill No. 6229, to allow a local railway to cross a reservation on Staten Island which was referred by the presiding officer to the Committee on Railroads within a few moments. I call attention to it and state that the same bill was considered some time ago by the Committee on Commerce to which it was referred and reported favorably to the Senate and is now on the Calendar of the Senate. Whenever I can reach that bill, my motion will be to substitute the House bill which is I am told in the same words as the bill carefully considered by the Committee on Commerce, referred to the proper Department, and acted upon by that committee. I ask the consent of the Senate now to reconsider this reference in order that the bill may lie on the table to the end that when the other bill is reached, if it be in the same words, it may be moved as a substitute for the Senate bill so as not to duplicate proceedings between the two Houses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the vote by which the bill referred to by the Senator from New York was sent to the Committee on Railroads will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The bill will lie on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. I now ask to be allowed to call up Senate bill No. 1744, reported from the Committee on Commerce; and while the Clerk finds the bill I will inform the Senate that it is a bill permitting a local railway for the convenience of the county of Richmond, which is Staten Island, to go across the corner of a reservation in the control of the Light-House Board. The people of Staten Island, both democrats and republicans, wish an opportunity to run a little railroad across the island by which they can get from place to place, and the committee has reported this bill, permitting the public authorities to allow the company to lay its track across this corner. That is all there is in it. I think no Senator will object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the bill (S. No. 1744) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through certain lands of the United States in Richmond County, New York, will be considered as before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to substitute for that bill the same bill which has been passed by the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from New York that the House bill was ordered a few moments ago to lie on the table, and he can now move to take it from the table.

Mr. CONKLING. I am very much obliged to the Chair for the information. I move to take up the House bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the bill mentioned by the Senator from New York will be considered at this time.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 6229) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through certain lands of the United States in Richmond County, New York.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from New York to the Senate bill on the same subject. What shall be done with it?

Mr. CONKLING. I move to postpone it indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

LAKE NEAR COUNCIL BLUFFS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to take up House bill No. 6527. It will take but a moment to consider it. I am not in the habit of troubling the Senate.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 6527) to grant to the corporate authorities of the city of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, for public uses, a certain lake known as Carr Lake, situated near said city.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have a short explanation from the Senator having the bill in charge.

Mr. ALLISON. There is a brief report, No. 818, which can be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HILL, of Colorado, February 1, 1881:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6527) to grant to the corporate authorities of the city of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, for public uses, a certain lake known as Carr Lake, situated near said city, has had the same under consideration and reports the same back recommending its passage, and adopts the report of the House committee, which is as follows:

"The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill H. R. No. 6527, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report thereon:

"The lake in question is situated near the corporate limits of the city of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa. It is a meandered lake, and lies within the limits described in the bill; it is about eighty-five rods in length, and has an average width of about forty-six rods. There is sufficient depth of water in this lake for small sail-boats and like water-crafts.

"The purpose of the bill is to give this lake to the city of Council Bluffs, to enable the lawfully constituted authorities of said city to have control, to improve and beautify the same, and make it a place of pleasant resort for its citizens. As it is now, the title is in the General Government, enabling persons to use the same much as they choose, without reference to public health or comfort.

"There has not been any perceptible change in this lake in any respect within the recollection of the first settlers of this part of the State.

"It is not now, and for aught that can be seen never will be, of any value to the United States, which is referred to only for the purpose of showing that the Government can have no such interest in this lake as to make the bill objectionable, or to cause any one to oppose its passage on that ground. This character of legislation has been repeatedly recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and in this connection attention is called to the recommendations of that officer transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior for the years 1877 and 1878, to be found in the reports of that officer to the Forty-fifth Congress, second session, Executive Document 1, part 5, pages 11 and 12, and to the third session, same Congress, on page 140. In the last of these recommendations the Commissioner, among other things, says:

"'I would therefore reiterate my recommendation that any title the United States may possess to the unsurveyed islands and beds of meandered lakes and sloughs (not navigable) be conveyed by act of Congress to the respective States in which they are situated, and such lands thus subjected to the operation of State laws.'

"The bill conveys the title of the United States to the lake to the corporate authorities of the city of Council Bluffs, upon the express condition that the same shall be held for public use, resort, and recreation, and provides that the same shall be inalienable for all time, thereby securing the same to the public use, without limit.

"Your committee would therefore recommend that the bill do pass."

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DR. A. SIDNEY TEBBS.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 1599, for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1599) for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs. It proposes to relieve Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs, of Leesburgh, Virginia, from the operation of section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear read the section referred to in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas calls for the reading of the section of the statute referred to.

Mr. McDONALD. I can state to the Senator from Kansas that it is the section that prohibits persons from being appointed into the military service of the United States who served in the late rebellion.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report in this case?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us hear it read.

Mr. McDONALD. I have not the section here, but that is the section which it is proposed to relieve this gentleman from.

Several SENATORS. Read the report.

Mr. McDONALD. Here is the report, all that there is of it.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HAMPTON January 27, 1881:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs, beg leave to report:

That Dr. Tebbs has been an applicant for appointment in the Army for several years past, but by reason of the restriction contained in section 1218, Revised Statutes, against the appointment of persons who were in the confederate service, his application cannot be considered. It appears that he entered the confederate service as a private at the age of fifteen, and that he is a native of Virginia. Your committee recommend the passage of the bill without amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire from what committee this bill is reported?

Mr. McDONALD. The Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the honorable Senator be kind enough to state to me in a word what it is?

Mr. McDONALD. It is a bill to relieve the party named in it, Dr. Tebbs, from the disabilities of the act of Congress that prohibits persons who served in the late rebellion from being appointed into the Army or Navy of the United States. It is to make him capable of being appointed. That is all. The fact in regard to this case is that he was in the military service of the rebellion as a private. He entered at the age of fifteen. How long he served I do not know, but he was only a boy when he went in and he could not have been a man when he came out. That is all there is of it. I have but very little acquaintance with him.

Mr. LOGAN. What is he to be appointed to?

Mr. McDONALD. That you will have to ask some other person besides myself. I do not think there can be any objection to relieving him from this disability.

Mr. HAMPTON. In looking at this bill I find that I had the honor of reporting it, and it was by the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs I looked into the case. This boy entered the confederate service as a private, and he has now made application to enter the United States Army and he is debarred by this statute. The bill is simply to remove that so that his application may be considered.

Mr. TELLER. In what capacity does he desire to enter the Army?

Mr. HAMPTON. I really do not know.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WYANDOT MISSION MONUMENT.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 142.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 142) relative to the erection of a monument at the Wyandot Mission, Upper Sandusky, Ohio.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand there are amendments to be offered. I have no objection if those amendments are offered.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes, sir. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings to propose the following as a substitute for the resolution:

Whereas by the treaty with the Wyandot Indians of October 5, 1842, the stone meeting-house and burying-grounds at Upper Sandusky, Ohio, were reserved to remain forever open and free for the purpose of interment and house of worship, and said building and burying-grounds are now rapidly going to decay: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed and authorized to take all necessary measures to rescue said church and graveyard at Upper Sandusky, Ohio, from decay; and that the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for that purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that the title of this resolution needs to be changed.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The title should be amended according to the body of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made if there be no objection.

A. B. ROWDEN.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask consent to call up House bill No. 706. I am quite sure there will be no objection to this. There is a report accompanying it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 706) for the relief of A. B. Rowden. It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers in the Treasury Department to pay to A. B. Rowden, of Meigs County, Tennessee, the pay due him as a second lieutenant of cavalry from the 31st of August, 1863, to the 7th of January, 1865, deducting all payments heretofore made to him as first sergeant in that regiment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND DISTRICT IN KANSAS.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 4411.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4411) to establish an additional land district in the State of Kansas.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with amendments: in line 5, after the word "range," to strike out "twenty-seven" and insert "thirty-one;" in line 9, before the word "standard," to strike out "third" and insert "fourth;" in line 11, before the word "south," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "twenty-one;" and in the same line, before the word "west," to strike out "twenty-seven" and insert "thirty-one;" so as to make the first section read:

That the following described territory in the State of Kansas, to wit, commencing at the southeast corner of township thirty-five south, range thirty-one west of the sixth principal meridian, on the south boundary of the State of Kansas; thence west on said southern boundary to the western boundary of said State; thence north on said western boundary to the fourth standard parallel south; thence east along said parallel to the northeast corner of township twenty-one south, range thirty-one west, and thence south to the place of beginning, in the State of Kansas, shall constitute an additional land district, to be called the southwestern land district, the location for the office of which shall be designated by the President of the United States, and shall by him from time to time be changed, as the public interest may seem to require.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN THORNLEY.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 1206) for the relief of Medical Director John Thornley, United States Navy.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply say to the Senator from Rhode Island that he will not be apt to get this bill through this evening at this late hour. It will take more than half an hour to consider it. I am not objecting to it, but I am simply stating that I shall consume more than half an hour in discussing the merits of the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I appeal to my friend from Missouri. I should think his heart, surrounded as he is by infantile loveliness now, would soften toward this poor old man tottering on the verge of the grave, who appeals to the Senate, not for liberality, not for magnanimity, not for generosity, but for simple, bald, naked justice. I hope he will allow this bill to come up and that he will allow it to pass.

Mr. COCKRELL. I recognize the warm, sympathetic appeals of my friend from Rhode Island, but they are not sufficient to induce me to voluntarily and willingly open the doors of the Treasury and let out $6,000 to a man who is not entitled to one particle nor a cent of it in any shape, manner, or form, without a full and fair discussion of the question by the Senate. I am not delaying action on it. I simply said to avoid the consumption of time without accomplishing anything, that the bill would not pass in thirty minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I cannot ask to have the bill taken up under such circumstances if the Senator is determined to defeat it by talking upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the request of the Senator from Rhode Island withdrawn?

Mr. ANTHONY. I withdraw it.

RESTORATION OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. FARLEY. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. No. 1210) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to notify the Senate that this bill will undoubtedly take up more than half an hour of our valuable time this afternoon. Let me add that I shall take some time to discuss this measure. I believe it is wrong, and I desire to enter a very earnest protest against its passage, and I shall occupy some portion of the time of the Senate.

Mr. FARLEY. I am satisfied that the Senator from New Hampshire intends to oppose this bill, but the bill has been considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs on two or three occasions, and a unanimous report has been made to the Senate. The bill passed the Senate at the last session and was kept over on the motion of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] and it has been reconsidered again by the committee and reported, and it is a matter that it is important to the parties interested to have passed.

Mr. ROLLINS. I reserve my right to object.

Mr. FARLEY. If I have the floor, the Senator can speak when I get through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. FARLEY. I desire to have this matter acted upon to-day if possible, and when we come to a controversy over it then the Senate may determine as between the committee and the Senator from New Hampshire. I ask now that the bill be taken up. There is no objection to taking it up, but he says it will take time. We cannot devote time better than to the consideration of this measure. It is a matter that has been passed by this body before when no objection was raised except by the Senator from Illinois, and I understand that honorable Senator has withdrawn the objection that he then made. I am satisfied that the bill is a meritorious one and ought to receive consideration at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration at this time of the bill that has just been read by its title. Is there objection?

Mr. ROLLINS. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. FARLEY. I move, then, to take the bill from the Calendar and proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I will yield for the purpose of enabling the Senator from California to test the motion he has now made, because I think he ought to have a chance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the bill mentioned by him.

Mr. INGALLS. Can that be done without disposing in some way of the pending order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proper motion would be to postpone the consideration of the pending and all prior orders.

Mr. FARLEY. I modify the motion so as to use that language.

Mr. HOAR. What is the pending order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair supposes it is the Indian severalty bill.

Mr. HOAR. Does that lose its place if this motion passes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has been for an hour or more proceeding by unanimous consent to the consideration of a large number of bills. The Senator from California moves that the pending and all prior orders be postponed, giving notice that he will then move to take up for consideration the bill mentioned by him. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President. It is that there is no such motion, while a matter is pending, known to the rules of the Senate, as that the pending and all prior orders be postponed. The motion must either be to postpone the pending order indefinitely, or to a day certain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Technically the Chair thinks the point of order raised by the Senator from Massachusetts is well taken, while the custom of the Senate almost invariably has been to put the question in the form the Chair stated it. The Chair supposes it would be proper for any Senator to move to postpone the pending order to a day certain or indefinitely, to bring it technically within the rule.

Mr. FARLEY. Then I will put my motion in this shape, that the standing and all prior orders be postponed until Monday next to enable me to call up this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion of the Senator from California, that the pending and all prior orders be postponed until Monday next?

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All the orders are postponed. The Senator from California now moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1210) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1210) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 9, after the word "authorize" to insert "to nominate and;" so as to make the section read:

That in conformity with, and to carry into effect the recommendations and conclusions of the board of officers organized in pursuance of a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution for the relief of Bushrod B. Taylor and other naval officers," approved February 5, 1879, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to promote, &c.

Mr. ROLLINS. Is there a report accompanying this bill? If so let it be read before action is had on the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. FARLEY January 12, 1881:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1210) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy, having duly considered the same, respectfully submit the following report:

This bill embodies the relief recommended by the board of admirals, organized and acting in pursuance of a joint resolution of Congress entitled "Joint resolution for the relief of Bushrod B. Taylor and other naval officers," approved February 5, 1879.

Your committee find, after careful examination, the following to be the facts upon which the report of the board is based:

Under the act of July 25, 1866, authorizing promotions to be made of "officers who have rendered the most faithful and efficient service during the recent war, and who possess the highest professional qualifications and attainments," certain promotions were made by selection by the Secretary of the Navy.

The selections so made were the cause of numerous and repeated complaints of injustice done thereby; and, at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Navy, in his report for 1869, a joint resolution was passed on July 1, 1870, authorizing him to convene a board of admirals to examine into the cases of all who deemed themselves unjustly passed over in the promotions made under the act of July 25, 1866.

That board, on the 21st December, 1871, (Senate Mis. Doc. No. 64, second session Forty-second Congress,) reported that they had "brought to bear an earnest and impartial desire to do their whole duty to the officers and to the naval service" in arriving at their conclusions, and that of the forty-four cases submitted to them they recommended only sixteen for advancement.

The Senate promptly passed a bill (No. 854 of that session) adopting without change the recommendation of the board; but in the House an amendment was adopted omitting the names of Lieutenant-Commanders Sands and Sigsbee, on an allegation that nobody was promoted over them, and that they were not injured, although the report of the board showed the contrary.

Those officers were absent on sea duty at the time, but soon after their return, upon ascertaining the cause of this adverse action, they petitioned Congress for relief, declaring the incorrectness in every respect of the allegation upon which that adverse action was based; and at the last session of Congress (second session Forty-fifth Congress) a bill (No. 1132) was reported for their relief, the Committee on Naval Affairs, in its report made by Senator JONES, (Report No. 282, second session Forty-fifth Congress,) saying that, after careful investigation into the facts, it was satisfied these officers had been wronged and were entitled to that relief.

Pending action on this bill, the joint resolution for the relief of Bushrod B. Taylor and other officers was passed, and approved February 5, 1879, to provide for the cases of all officers who had not had an opportunity to appear in person before the first board of admirals; and as neither Mr. Sands nor Mr. Sigsbee had been able to appear in person before the first board, it was suggested to them by the Naval Committee of the House that they could obtain the relief they desired, and have justice done them, by going before the second board of admirals. As this gave them an opportunity to present more fully their cause of grievance, those officers did, with twenty-one others whose cause of grievance was similar, and who also came within the provisions of the joint resolution, submit their complaints for consideration to this last board; which duly and fully considered the same, and submitted their report to Congress in Executive Document No. 42, second session Forty-sixth Congress.

From this report it appears that this board of admirals, after examination into twenty-three cases submitted to them, recommend for restoration only the five officers whose names are given in the bill now reported; and one of these officers, Commodore Hunt, is on the retired list, and the other four, Messrs. Erben, Glass, Sands, and Sigsbee, on the active list of the Navy.

In organizing these boards of admirals, Congress has sought to avoid favoritism by submitting the claims of all alike to experienced and superior officers, by their rank and great distinction above the temptation of personal interest; and it is submitted that Congress should not disregard the intelligent and impartial action of the special tribunals it has authorized to pass upon these matters.

Therefore, with an amendment inserting the word "relative" after the word "original," in the nineteenth and twenty-second lines of the bill, simply to make it conform literally to the recommendations of the board, which clearly desired thus to indicate the positions to which the officers named should be restored relatively to those who had been promoted over them in 1866 unjustly, your committee, convinced of the propriety of the recommendations of this board of admirals, as being in the best interests of the service and as doing simple justice to the officers named, report the bill with a recommendation that it be passed.

Mr. ROLLINS. Mr. President, this is one of several attempts to correct alleged errors of the Navy Department. In the past there have been several attempts, ostensibly to correct errors that were made in regard to officers, but really to "jump" men who at times have been thought to be unjustly treated, and this, in my judgment, is one of the baldest and worst attempts that have been made.

Now, Mr. President, what are the facts? Under the act of 1866 the Secretary of the Navy was authorized to advance certain officers of a lower grade, to put them in a higher grade. He was authorized to make selections for that purpose. He did make the selections in accordance with his best judgment. The law was fulfilled; it was accomplished. Subsequently there were parties who thought they had been unjustly treated. Two of those gentlemen, Messrs. Sigsbee and Sands, are named in this bill. They thought they had been unjustly passed over by the Secretary of the Navy. He was familiar with all that had transpired during the war; he understood very well the merits of the various officers of the Navy; he sought the advice of an advisory board, and with all the information that he could get he made these promotions, and he did not promote Mr. Sigsbee and Mr. Sands. I will read the provisions of the act of 1866:

That the increase in the grades authorized by this act shall be made by selection from the grade next below of officers who have rendered the most efficient and faithful service during the recent war, and who possess the highest professional qualifications and attainments.

Now, these parties say that the Secretary acted unjustly, that the promotions he made were unjust, and they want a correction made; they want an increase in the higher grade, so that they may be promoted. What are the facts? Under that act three masters were promoted in 1866 by Secretary Welles, namely, George W. Coffin, R. D. Evans, and D. R. Cassell, over the rest of their class. Mr. Sands, one of the parties interested in this bill, stood at that time No. 19 upon the list, Mr. Sigsbee 41, Mr. Cassell 28, Mr. Coffin 48, and Mr. Evans 32. Mr. Cassell is now dead, leaving but two in the service who were then promoted over Messrs. Sands and Sigsbee, so that as the Navy Register now stands there is but one officer promoted over Sigsbee and two over Sands. Sigsbee, therefore, stands only one number lower and Sands but two numbers lower than they would have stood had there been no promotions under the act of 1866.

I have the printed list here from the Navy Register to show that one of these men stands only one number lower than he would have done, and the other but two numbers lower than he would have done if these promotions under the act of 1866 had not taken place. Now, what is it proposed to do? You take Mr. Sands from No. 19 and make him No. 3 on the list.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. May I ask a question?

Mr. ROLLINS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Is not that what the board of admirals recommended in the case?

Mr. ROLLINS. I think not. I will come to that by and by. You propose to take Mr. Sands from No. 19. Sands has lost but two numbers on the Register by reason of these promotions, and you propose to take him from No. 19 and make him No. 3, and that will be a promotion of sixteen points. I want the Senate to understand when they pass this bill just what is being done and the injustice that is being done to men who have never stood below these men, who have always stood above them.

Now, let us take the case of Sigsbee, who has lost one number. You propose to take him from No. 40, and make him stand upon the list No. 5, jumping him thirty-five numbers. You propose now to do injustice to all these men, and advance him thirty-five numbers on the list, and that, you say in your bill, is "the same original relative rank." I should like to ask the gentlemen who have reported this bill to explain what "original relative rank" means in their bill. When did they (Sands and Sigsbee) stand in such relation to these parties? Never. It is an act of gross injustice.

The joint resolution of 1870 authorized the appointment of a board to hear the complaints of such officers as deemed themselves unjustly passed over by the promotions made in conformity with the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866. The resolution reads as follows:

That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to organize a board of three officers, not below the grade of rear-admiral, who shall examine into the cases of such officers as may deem themselves unjustly passed over by promotions made in conformity with the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866. This board shall report their conclusions to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall report the same to Congress.

This board did make an examination, and they recommended that these parties be advanced a few points, some eight or ten. I have the exact number here but cannot put my hand on it at this moment. They did recommend some slight promotion to these parties, and they appealed to Congress. They came here, and in the Congress of the United States their names were stricken from the bill and Congress disapproved of the recommendation of that board, and they were not promoted. What next happened? The Congress of the United States in the joint resolution of February 5, 1879, provided—

That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to organize a board of three officers not below the grade of rear admiral, who shall examine into the case of Commander Bushrod B. Taylor and such other officers of the Navy—

Now mark the language of the statute—

as did not have opportunity from any cause whatever to appear before the board created by virtue of the joint resolution of July 1, 1870, as may deem themselves unjustly passed over by the promotions made in conformity with the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866.

This act of 1879 provided what? Simply that those officers who did not go before the previous board might go before the board of 1879. Both Sigsbee and Sands had gone before the board of 1870, and that board acted upon their cases, and made its recommendations to Congress, and the Congress of the United States refused to approve of the action of the board. Then what? These men, without any authority of law whatever, appeared before the board of 1879, and that board having reported to Congress, their report is construed by the Committee on Naval Affairs as authorizing the taking of these men, who have lost one of them one point, and the other only two points, and advancing one of them thirty-five numbers, and the other from No. 19 to No. 3, sixteen numbers; and they say that is the same original relative position they would have occupied. Mr. President, I should like to have somebody explain this.

To show that I am right in the figures I have stated, let me present lists taken from the Navy Register:

The proposition of the bill is—

To promote Lieutenant-Commander James H. Sands to be commander, and restore him to his original relative position on the active list of the Navy next below Commander Charles McGregor.

Will not some member of the Committee on Naval Affairs show me when and where this officer, Sands, was ever next below Charles McGregor? Take the case of Mr. Sigsbee:

To promote Lieutenant-Commander Charles D. Sigsbee to be commander, and restore him to his original relative position on the active list of the Navy next below Commander Robley D. Evans.

When did he stand next below Robley D. Evans?

Now let us look and see where these two gentlemen did stand. On the Navy Register before the promotion under the act of 1866 Sands was No. 19, next to J. B. Coghlan; Charles D. Sigsbee No. 39, next below Francis Morris. After the promotions they stood in position next to the same parties. Now we propose to take Sands, as I said before, from No. 19, where he stands next below J. B. Coghlan, and place him so that he will be No. 3 on the Register, next below Charles McGregor, and they call this "the same original relative position."

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire if he has examined the bill and the Navy Register to see that the statement he makes is correct?

Mr. ROLLINS. I have.

Mr. ALLISON. Because I understand the Senator from Florida to dispute that statement. I think that is a very important statement.

Mr. ROLLINS. Any Senator has access to the Navy Register, and he will find that what I say about these matters is absolutely true; that in this attempt to restore these men, to give them, the one one point and the other two points, which I admit they lost by the act of 1866, it simply jumps them over all those officers who graduated above them from the Naval Academy, have always stood above them on the list, and have seen as much or more service, as their records will show. Can this with any justice be called their original relative position on the list? By reference to the last printed Navy list it will be seen that there are nine lieutenant commanders who are and always have been above Sands, and twenty-five who are and always have been above Sigsbee; and yet to give them the two numbers which they lost fifteen years ago this great injustice is proposed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, that is, to jump one thirty-five points and the other sixteen, and put them as the bill says next below officers that they have never stood next to before and ought not to now.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I would suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire and to the Senate that this is almost too important a bill to be acted on in the manner in which it has been acted on this afternoon, and I suggest that the Senator give way for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. ROLLINS. Certainly. I would say in justice to myself that I gave notice to the Senate this bill would undoubtedly create quite a lengthy discussion and it will. There is much more to be said upon it. I will now give way to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask the Senator not to press that motion now.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not desire to cut off debate on this bill, or the Senator from Florida from being heard, but only to suggest that the bill cannot be passed just now in this confusion.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Has the Senator from New Hampshire concluded?

Mr. ROLLINS. No, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Does the Senator hold the floor?

Mr. ROLLINS. I hold the floor. I am willing to yield for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Now I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 5, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. BICKNELL. I rise to a question of the highest privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BICKNELL. I call up from the Speaker's table the Senate concurrent resolution in reference to the meeting of the two Houses on Wednesday next to count the votes for President and Vice-President.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) First. That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 9th of February, 1881, at twelve o'clock meridian, pursuant to the requirements of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States; and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Second. That if it shall appear that any votes of electors for President or Vice-President of the United States have been given on a day other than that fixed for casting such votes by act of Congress, in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, if the counting or omitting to count such votes shall not essentially change the result of the election, they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of electors cast on the —— day of ——, 1880, to be counted, the result would be for A B for President of the United States —— votes, and for C D for President of the United States —— votes; if not counted, the result would be for A B for President of the United States —— votes, and for C D for President of the United States —— votes; but in either event —— is elected President of the United States. And in the same manner for Vice-President.

Mr. ROBESON. Is the question divisible? There are two resolutions.

The SPEAKER. There are two resolutions.

Mr. ROBESON. Then I call for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. A division of the question being called for, the first question will be upon the first resolution just reported.

Mr. ROBESON. Is it competent for me to state now in a few words why I ask for a division of the question?

The SPEAKER. The resolution is before the House. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BICKNELL] has charge of it.

Mr. BICKNELL. I will make a few remarks, after which I will yield to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.]

It is alleged that the electors of one of the States cast their votes on a day not prescribed by law. The question will be raised whether or not the votes of that State shall be counted. That is a difficult and doubtful question, and the Constitution has not declared by whom the question shall be decided.

A like difficulty has arisen several times heretofore: once in 1821, in relation to the State of Missouri; once in 1837, in relation to the State of Michigan; and once in 1857, in relation to the State of Wisconsin. In all those cases the votes of those States were disputed. In the first two of those cases a resolution was adopted identical with the one now before the House; in the third of those cases no such resolution was adopted, and the result was an angry and bitter debate, a dangerous debate, ending in no practical result.

The object of this resolution is to avoid any such difficulty. Whether the vote of the State in question be counted or not counted will make no difference in the result. Everybody admits that General Garfield has been elected President of the United States, and will be so declared. But in order to avoid the difficulty that arose in the case of Wisconsin this resolution is proposed, and I trust it will be passed unanimously. I now yield——

Mr. STEVENSON. Before the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BICKNELL] takes his seat, as he has given this matter much study and investigation, and as it is an important question, I would like to have him state his own views in regard to the counting of the votes of such States.

Mr. BICKNELL. I do not think it is necessary to make any declaration on that subject now. The object of this resolution is to avoid any discussion in regard to the question whether that vote shall be counted or not counted. The resolution provides for the same hypothetical counting which tided us over the difficulty once before, and I hope it will do so again.

I now yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] for ten minutes.

Mr. CARLISLE. Before the gentleman yields, allow me to call attention to what may be termed the enacting clause of this resolution. The printed copies laid upon our desks a few moments ago seem to indicate that it is a simple Senate resolution. According to that printed copy it simply provides "resolved, that the two Houses of Congress shall assemble," &c.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read so much of the resolution as will answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 9th of February, 1881——

Mr. CARLISLE. That is sufficient to answer my question. The copy laid upon our tables does not contain those words.

Mr. BICKNELL. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.]

Mr. ROBESON. I certainly shall make no factious opposition to these resolutions as presented to-day. I am in favor of the first resolution, since it is the identical one, if I mistake not, which was presented by myself before the holiday recess for the acceptance of the other side of this House.

In regard to the second resolution, it would not become me, and I think under the circumstances of this case it would hardly become any of us, to do more at this time in opposition to its passage than record our votes according to our own opinions upon the question of principle involved. But I must take time to congratulate the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber on their return to the principles of the old democracy. It was rather a singular circumstance, I confess, that in a discussion involving so much of principle as was involved in that on the Morgan resolution, no man on the so-called democratic side of the Chamber was willing to stand up and take his position on the side of constitutional State rights. For myself I opposed the original resolution known as the Morgan-Bicknell resolution reported by the gentleman from Indiana, because I thought it was an assumption on the part of the two Houses of Congress of powers given by the Constitution to the States; because I thought that the electors were State officers discharging their duty under State sanction and producing before the two Houses State authentication as their ample authority. I found in that resolution principles and provisions which would have permitted the two Houses of Congress to go behind the returns of the States, to canvass the votes there cast for the electors by them appointed, and, at the will of one House alone, to overthrow and destroy State constitutional action in direct and flagrant violation of the Constitution of our fathers and of the principles of government which they gave to us.

I am not, I suppose, considered a special advocate of State rights; but I am an advocate of the Constitution of the United States, and I will stand on the border-line of the State rights there guaranteed with the gentleman from Indiana, and whenever they are attacked will repel with my voice and by my vote any such insolent invasion from any source. And in this spirit I congratulate my friends on the other side of the House that they have returned to the old principle of State rights which was the shibboleth of the old but which is the byword of the modern democracy. And out of the fullness of my heart I congratulate the gentleman from Illinois also—I mean my friend who sits before me with a smile upon his lips and the white rose upon his breast, [Mr. SPRINGER]—that we shall have the honor and the pleasure of his company and countenance next Wednesday when we are here to witness the declaration of the votes and action of the people of this great country. I should be sad, indeed, if he were absent, I should have been sorry if any individual member or officer of this House should have felt called upon next Wednesday, to interpose any either formal or actual obstruction to the formal declaration of the will of the people of the United States. But I must say to him and to all others that after the people had acted, after the States had appointed their electors in accordance with the Constitution, after those electors had voted, as there prescribed, and their votes had come here, authenticated according to law, the result of such constitutional action of the people of this great country would have been declared and would have taken effect even though the gentleman from Illinois had felt himself constrained to be absent. [Laughter.] He might have withdrawn himself from this Chamber and his countenance from the action which here took place, but the votes of the people would have still been counted, the progress of civil government would not have been abruptly checked, and the world itself would still have rolled on without a shock and still remained, a monument of the abounding mercy as of the power of God.

Mr. BICKNELL. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] for three minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not want three minutes. I wish simply to say a word by way of supplement to the gushing congratulations of our friend from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] who finds so much upon which now to congratulate the democratic party and the democratic members of this House. I wish to say that while I am not now prepared to congratulate him and the republican party upon the vote on this subject, I expect when the vote is taken to be able to congratulate him and them that they have abandoned the methods of revolution and at last consented to lawfully count the vote for President of the United States.

Mr. BICKNELL. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FELTON.]

Mr. ROBESON. One moment before the gentleman from Georgia proceeds. I only want, in acknowledgment of what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has said——[Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey will observe the rules.

Mr. ROBESON. Undoubtedly; I thought I had the floor. Will my friend from Indiana indulge me one moment? [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. FELTON. Mr Speaker, I think this the most favorable time for Congress to determine certain questions connected with the count of the electoral vote; favorable because the final result will not be changed by any conclusion the two Houses of Congress may definitely reach. If the result was doubtful, or if it was poised tremblingly upon the counting or rejection of the vote of any one State, we might fear the influence of partisan prejudice, of sectional preferences, or of personal ambitions in the settlement of those questions.

But all parties, all sections of the country, and every citizen of the United States acknowledges the election, according to law, of James A. Garfield to the Presidency. No man of intelligence or lover of this country questions his title to the highest office in the gift of the American people.

I believe that questions which may arise when the two Houses of Congress are in joint session for the purpose of counting and announcing the result of the electoral vote should be decided then and there by that joint assembly.

I know of no authority in the Constitution authorizing the two Houses to separate for the purpose of investigating and deciding questions connected with this count in their respective Chambers.

The resolution now pending seems upon the whole unobjectionable. It is freed from the principal difficulty which attached to the electoral-count resolutions which we have been considering for some time during this Congress, known as the Morgan-Bicknell resolutions, namely, it does not give one House of Congress the right and power to disfranchise one of the States of this Union, to throw out its vote for President and Vice-President when that vote has been cast according to law.

I have one very serious objection to the resolution now under consideration, (though I shall vote for it.) Indeed I think the entire second section should be stricken out and something definite inserted. The object of the section is to avoid the decision of a very important question. It postpones a settlement which some day in its settlement might involve the peace and the very existence of this Republic. I allude to the manner in which the concurrent resolution proposes to treat the returns from a State which through the ignorance or perversity of State authorities cast its electoral vote on a day unknown to the law. This question must be decided definitely some day. Whenever its decision will affect the final result the whole country will demand a final solution of the difficulty, and its decision at such a critical juncture in the affairs of the nation would, I repeat, hazard the peace and existence of the Government. Parties would be excited, political passion uncurbed by reason or law would madly demand the counting or rejection of such a vote as either course might affect its favorite candidate. Compromises might be forgotten, the inestimable value of the Government lost sight of, and the sword invoked as the only arbiter in such a controversy. Cases in which votes were rejected have occurred several times. That is, votes of doubtful validity were simply laid aside, as this joint rule proposes to do. Fortunately, the result then, as now, was unaffected by this indefinite action. On the occasions referred to there were some apologies for the failure to elect according to law. Reconstruction, new State constitutions, and other causes afforded some excuse for the failure. But now there is no reason saving the ignorance or perversity of State officials for this great wrong against the people of Georgia. For I assert that the failure of the electors to meet on the day prescribed by the Federal law to cast their votes in accordance with the popular vote of the State is an unpardonable outrage upon the right of suffrage. It sets aside the votes of all its citizens. It disfranchises the State of Georgia.

Mark you, it is not the law that disfranchises; for that makes provision whereby every man's vote in that popular election might have been effective in making up the result in the State. It was the action of Georgia's officials that is now about to set aside Georgia's vote. It was the ignorance or perversity of Georgia's executive that is now disfranchising our State. In the name of the people of Georgia, I protest that they were not and are not responsible for this failure to comply with the supreme law of the United States fixing the day on which the vote should be cast.

The people of Georgia are, and have been since the late civil war ended, perfectly loyal to the Government. And I assert most positively that where there are Federal and State laws conflicting in regard to Federal elections, the Federal law is supreme. [Applause.]

The great mass of our people desire full and perfect conformity to all the laws of this Federal Union. This failure to cast their vote on the day required by the Federal law is not the act or wish of the people of Georgia. They are prepared to announce to all the world that the old idea of "State sovereignty" overriding Federal laws touching Federal elections is an exploded doctrine. [Applause.] I am opposed to counting the vote of Georgia, and at the same time I protest against the ignorance or perversity by which the people of my State have been deprived of their vote. [Renewed applause.]

Now I ask, Mr. Speaker, as my time is out, the privilege to print just a few more remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to print further remarks.

Mr. CARLISLE. Before that consent is granted, I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. FELTON. Certainly.

Mr. CARLISLE. Whether he means to convey to this House the idea that it was the intention of the Legislature of Georgia by the passage of the law under which this electoral vote was cast to defy the authority of the General Government, or whether it was a mere mistake or oversight?

Mr. FELTON. It was not——

Mr. CARLISLE. Very well, then.

Mr. FELTON. It was not, but the Legislature of Georgia was in session nearly a month from the day of the election until the vote was cast, and there was time sufficient to have had all this thing righted and conformed to the Federal law; the whole of it.

Mr. HOUSE. Was the attention of the Legislature directed to it?

Mr. FELTON. It was not. The newspapers told us that the attention of the executive of Georgia—and I have nothing but respect for that executive—was called to it and the newspaper interview represents him as saying that if he had known otherwise he would still have done as he did.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Speaker, if that be the gentleman's understanding as to the motives which actuated the State of Georgia, I fail to see the relevancy of the remarks which he has made this morning.

Mr. FELTON. I tell you the people of Georgia have no desire to violate the Federal law, none whatever. When this act was passed there was no intention or purpose on the part of our Legislature to conflict with the Federal law.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I ask whether that law was not put into our code of 1862, when we were under a president of the Confederate States, and got into the code by carelessness, and by carelessness was copied into our present compilation? That is the fact.

Mr. FELTON rose.

Mr. BICKNELL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia. [Mr. SPEER.]

Mr. FELTON. Let me beg a few minutes more. I ask consent for a few moments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will be allowed to answer that question as it is a very important one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is quite willing, but the gentleman from Indiana declines.

Mr. BICKNELL. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SPEER.]

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will allow that question to be answered.

Mr. BICKNELL. I yield for two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SPEER.]

Mr. O'NEILL. The difficulty is we cannot all have an opportunity to say a word. I want a vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Speaker, I believe I will make a remark supplementary to that which has just been made by my colleague. He says that henceforth the people of Georgia will be loyal to the Federal power. Sir, I say that the people of Georgia have been loyal to the Federal power since we laid down our arms in good faith in 1865, and that when we accepted the amendments to the Constitution we accepted them in good faith, and we have abided by them.

In that remark I do not intend offensively to reflect in any sense on the remark which has just fallen from the gentleman from Georgia, and which I have quoted, but make that declaration for myself.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] did some of us injustice when he said that none on this side dared to stand forth and speak for what we understood to be true democracy against this Morgan joint resolution. There were three of us over here who did that thing, and our votes are found recorded against it. And I congratulate my brethren of the democratic party that we have reached a solution of this question upon which we can agree, and which will not do violence to those grand rights of the sovereign States for which I thought I was speaking when I voted against that joint resolution which took the power from the States and vested it in Congress. This resolution now to be adopted by Congress has speedily justified that vote.

I have, sir, been criticised, together with my colleagues who voted against that resolution, by the ultra partisan press. But those criticisms were not due solely to the fact that we voted against the resolution, but also perhaps to the fact that we had antagonized ultra partisan methods in the Empire State of the South. We were right, and I stand to that vote, and I find now, if I mistake not, that all the democracy here are standing shoulder to shoulder with us, and upon the same line on which we then stood.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to allow me to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. BICKNELL. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that in the distribution of the time he yield alternately to each side of the House.

Mr. REED. Well, the gentleman from Illinois ought to have a chance to come in.

Mr. BICKNELL. I yield, then, to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] for five minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall need less time than that. I only desire to say, in behalf of my own vote, I wish that nothing against the right of the State of Georgia to be counted shall be inferred from the terms of the second resolution.

It is a principle usually held, or professedly at least, that the will of the people of a State if clearly asserted shall be allowed to have its due weight notwithstanding the negligence or errors of its mere servants or delegates. I will venture to say that if it depended upon my vote, I should vote to accept the vote of Georgia in this case, because the error was not the fault of the people of the State, but of their servants.

I do not care, sir, to argue the case, but only affirm, as I do again, that I shall favor the passage of this second resolution, and that it shall be construed as not prejudicing the right of the State of Georgia to be counted if it shall be essential.

Mr. BICKNELL. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] five minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] very kindly referred to the fact that there will be no obstacle now, after the passage of this resolution, to my personal attendance at the count of the electoral votes on Wednesday next. I am grateful to the gentleman for calling my attention to that fact. If there is a duty which is imposed upon me as a member of Congress that I do not desire to shrink from it is the duty of participating as a member of the House of Representatives in the counting of the electoral votes.

I have always believed, Mr. Speaker, and still believe, that it is the right and duty of the two Houses to count these votes. And as a member of one of the Houses whose duty it is under the Constitution to count them, I am gratified to know that I shall be permitted by the kind courtesy of the gentleman on the other side to attend on Wednesday next as a member of this House and participate in that duty. But the doctrine of gentlemen upon the other side that we were to participate here, not in the capacity of members of this House in the performance of a high constitutional duty, but simply to look on as idle spectators—that we were to go through the mere farce of counting by sitting here and witnessing the count of the Vice-President or the President of the Senate, has been repudiated by gentlemen on the other side. In such a revolutionary and unconstitutional proceeding I did not desire to be a spectator. And I am glad that this House will not now be invited to attend such an unauthorized and revolutionary proceeding as that. It would have been under such circumstances as my friend from Kentucky [Mr. OSCAR TURNER] has said a mere mockery and not a count of the votes under the Constitution. You might just as well direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to count them, as the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] said in his speech in the Senate, or have it done by the Doorkeeper or the pages, if it is a mere clerical labor of that kind. For if it is a mere matter of counting, anybody can perform that unofficial and clerical duty.

This side of the House has clung tenaciously to the precedents established from the foundation of the Government down to the present time as to the right and duty of the two Houses, under the Constitution, to count the electoral votes. And the duty of the Vice-President, or President of the Senate, to preside simply, and act as the official organ of the two Houses in declaring such a result as the tellers—the agents of the two Houses—may report to him for declaration, has always been maintained as a logical deduction from the language of the Constitution itself. That is all he has to do. This resolution recognizes that duty as the limit of his powers under the Constitution. He is our organ merely—our mouth-piece to declare the result which the two Houses, through their agents, have found. That doctrine is recognized in this resolution. That is the old democratic doctrine; the doctrine maintained through all these years, and I congratulate the other side of the House that they have at last abandoned the revolutionary [derisive laughter upon the republican side] idea that the Vice-President is to count the electoral votes.

Mr. BICKNELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] has been on the floor desiring recognition.

Mr. BICKNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania one minute.

Mr. O'NEILL. I simply desire to congratulate the people of the country that the Senate of the United States has passed in a patriotic and sensible way this concurrent resolution, and that it will pass the House, so that it will have passed both Houses of Congress prior to the count of the electoral vote on Wednesday next. The people ought to be congratulated on this, and I for one want the vote taken without any delay so that we may place on the record our names by an aye-and-no vote as another precedent that we are patriotic enough to carry out the intention of the Constitution and the laws; so that we may count the vote on the day specified and inaugurate on the 4th day of March, as determined by the election and in the usual way, the distinguished men who have been elected President and Vice-President of the United States. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BICKNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] five minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not rise for the purpose of specially opposing these resolutions. The first resolution is in the usual form, and it is wholly unobjectionable. The second resolution provides the alternative of not counting the vote of any State about which there may be a question. Of course that is directed, in this particular case, against the State of Georgia. It is seemingly an innocent expedient. It has precedent for it; but it is objectionable because it assumes a direction by Congress in the counting of the electoral votes. It undertakes to direct by a mere resolution of the two Houses what the President of the Senate shall do in the performance of a constitutional duty specially cast on him.

I deny that any power, whether the Vice-President or the Congress of the United States, has the right to say the counting of the vote of any State shall not take place, and I deny that there is any power anywhere to reject the vote of any State after it has been cast and properly certified and returned. I believe the election of President and Vice-President took place, in effect, at least, in November last. I believe that on the first Wednesday in December last the voice of the people was recorded through the electoral colleges over this country, and that the President and Vice-President of the United States were then elected, and that the forms we are about to go through here are mere forms provided and fixed by the Constitution. I believe that our action in the matter of counting electoral votes does not make or unmake the President or Vice-President.

In the presence of the two Houses the Constitution requires certain things to be done, which amounts only to a public declaration of an election of President and Vice-President which has already taken place.

After electoral votes are ascertained to have been cast, it would be high usurpation in any person, official, or body to reject them.

I wish to say a single word in reference to Georgia. If the question were presented here now, with the light I have upon that subject, I should, if I were to participate in determining it—and I do not see how that could possibly be under the Constitution—I should be in favor of counting the vote of Georgia, because I believe the people voted in November for electors for President and Vice-President. They then elected the electors of the State; and while those electors did not meet on the precise day fixed by the laws of the United States, still they seem to have in good faith met and cast their votes in accordance with the instructions and directions, so to speak, of the people of the State of Georgia. There was no fraud or intention to commit fraud or wrong. I do not hold that time can be the essence of that vote, although I admit if any fraud or any wrong were thereby committed, the State might be disfranchised for that reason.

Mr. COOK. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KEIFER. I will hear it.

Mr. COOK. Suppose the vote of Georgia changed the result of the presidential election, would you then vote for counting it?

Mr. CALKINS. I would if there were no fraud.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not admit, in the first place, that I would have or could have, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, any right to decide that question; but if I had, as I now understand it, I should vote under such state of case to admit the votes of that State in the count.

Mr. BICKNELL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. STEVENSON.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, while I shall vote for the pending joint resolution, I regret that it is not so framed as to squarely meet the question as to whether the electoral vote of the State of Georgia shall be counted or rejected upon next Wednesday. Knowing that the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BICKNELL] had given much thought and investigation to this subject, I called his attention to this matter a few moments ago and asked what conclusion he had reached in regard to this important question. But I regret to see that the temper of this House seems now to be in favor of evading rather than settling this question. For myself I agree with the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] that the people of the State of Georgia should not be deprived of the right to have their vote counted because of the ignorance or mistake of the officials of that State. A mere technicality cannot deprive the people of the right to be heard upon the most momentous question upon which they are ever called to act.

This identical question arose in 1857 in regard to counting the electoral vote of the State of Wisconsin. The electors failed to meet and cast the vote for President and Vice-President upon the day prescribed, having been delayed by a snow-storm. The question as to counting the vote of Wisconsin was raised in the joint session in February, 1857, but was soon settled, as the result did not depend upon that State.

Mr. Speaker, for the reason that the vote of the State of Georgia is not decisive of the presidential election, I urge that a precedent be now established. Let this question be now met and settled, so that the decision reached after a non-partisan discussion, and when the result will be unchanged by that determination, may stand as a precedent in our legislative history. Had this question arisen four years ago, the question of future party supremacy might have depended upon its settlement. In the temper the public mind then was, with such issues at stake, with the Senate and House under different party control, how utterly futile would have been any attempt to fairly determine this question. Possibly, sir, this question may come up at some future period of our history, when its decision shall be literally the determination of who shall be the President and Vice-President of the United States. Should such an exigency arise, it will be well for the country if a precedent has been established, assented to, and concurred in by all parties.

While I believe the vote of Georgia should be counted, yet, sir, I deem it far more important that a wise precedent be now established, to which we may confidently appeal amidst the turmoil of political excitement, and when the peace of the country is trembling in the balance.

Mr. BICKNELL. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. COOK.]

Mr. COOK. My colleague [Mr. FELTON] has made something of an attack on the loyalty of the State of Georgia. In November, 1865, with two of my colleagues, I was in the constitutional convention of that State. In that convention the State of Georgia recognized the thirteenth amendment; and from that hour to this no act has ever been placed upon her statute-book in contravention of the power and authority of this Government. There is but one disloyal man in my State who denies the authority of this Government, and he is the strongest and ablest advocate whom the gentleman representing the seventh district [Mr. FELTON] has. He is the only Bourbon democrat in the State. He denounces this Government and everybody who does not kneel down and support the honorable gentleman, my colleague from the seventh district.

The people of Georgia are loyal to this Government. They recognize fully the power of Government under the Constitution, and there has been no act of the Legislature in opposition to it; and no party of the State of Georgia, no man except one, a special advocate and friend of my colleague, [Mr. FELTON,] defies in any manner whatever the power and authority of this Government.

As regards the time when the electoral college met, our governor made the same mistake as the President did when he appointed the Secretary of War to act as Secretary of the Navy for ten days, and again for ten days, until he found, when his attention was called to it by the Attorney-General, that he was exceeding his authority.

Mr. VALENTINE. Will the gentleman inform the House when the law under which the electoral college met was passed?

Mr. BICKNELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HAMMOND.]

Mr. CONGER. I submit that in a fair distribution of time the floor should not be allotted to three or four on one side and then to one on another. Several gentlemen on this side have attempted to get the eye of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BICKNELL,] but either because he wants to punish us for past conduct, or for some other reason, they have failed to obtain his recognition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BICKNELL] is in charge of the resolution and has control of the first hour for debate. During that hour the Chair has nothing whatever to do with assigning the floor to gentlemen. The Chair will state, however, that he thinks the gentleman from Indiana has shown a disposition to yield the floor to gentlemen on both sides of the House. On the side of the House where the gentleman from Michigan sits four gentlemen have spoken, the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.] The Chair thinks that upon examination it will be found that the time has been fairly divided.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I desire simply to verify a statement which I made from memory while my colleague [Mr. FELTON] was upon the floor. I will read from the code of Georgia of 1861, which by law took effect on the 1st day of January, 1862. Section 1252 of that code is in these words:

On the twentieth day after said election shall have taken place it is the duty of the governor to consolidate the several returns and immediately notify those persons of their election who have received a vote amounting to a majority, and to require their attendance at the capitol on the first Monday in December thereafter to cast the vote of the State on the Wednesday following, at twelve o'clock m.

By a careless compilation that got into the code of 1862, and by oversight it also got into the code of 1868, and in that way misled the parties. I wish now to make one other quotation from every constitution of Georgia except that which she had during the war, to show her loyalty to the laws of the Union. (I quote from memory, but am correct as to the fact:)

The laws of force in this State shall be as follows: The Constitution of the United States as the supreme law; as next in order, treaties and statutes of the United States made and enacted pursuant to said Constitution; as next in order, the constitution of the State, and under that the statutes of said State of Georgia.

Allow me to make another remark. I reget that my colleague from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] should arraign the rest of us, both of his State and of his party, for an alleged dereliction in duty, in order to justify what some have thought to be his violation of party allegiance and fealty. It may be a subject of congratulation to him that in his estimation now the tail wags the dog. Let it be so.

I desire, however, as I am in the line of quoting authorities, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman that the independent is always right and everybody else is wrong, to quote a declaration from Coke's Institutes, made many years ago of course.

Lord Coke in the Fourth Institute draws a parallel between a useful member of Parliament—one possessed of all "properties a Parliament man should have"—and the Solomon of the bestial world, to wit, the elephant. "Every member of the House," he says, "being a counselor, should have three properties of the elephant: first, that he hath no gall; secondly, that he is inflexible and cannot bow; thirdly, that he is of a most ripe and perfect memory. * * * We will add two other properties of the elephant—the one that the elephant is philanthropos, homini erranti viam ostendit, (a philanthropist who showed the wanderer his road.) The other, that though they be maximæ virtutis et maximi intellectus, of greatest strength and understanding, tamen gregatim semper incedunt, yet they are sociable, and go in companies. Sociable creatures that go in flocks or herds are not hurtful, as deer, sheep, &c., but beasts that walk solely or singularly, as bears, foxes, &c., are dangerous and hurtful. [Great laughter.] And these properties ought every Parliament man to have." (Heard's Curiosities of the Law Reporters, page 183.)

Mr. BICKNELL. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS.]

Mr. CALKINS. I will not require five minutes to express my judgment, first upon the rule which has been brought here from the Senate, and next with reference to counting the vote of the State of Georgia, which has been incidentally referred to in this debate.

In the first place, I desire to say that it is well known to many of my colleagues that I do not agree that there is any power under the Constitution in the Vice-President to count the electoral votes of the States, in the sense of determining any question of fact. It certainly follows that if a man is to perform judicial functions in determining any question of fact, he must hear evidence to determine it. I do not agree that the Vice-President under the Constitution has any power to hear testimony or to decide any controverted question of fact.

Neither do I agree that the two Houses of Congress, acting separately or in joint convention, have any such power. My judgment is that in all instances which have arisen or which may arise hereafter relative to any disputed vote, the matter should be referred to some tribunal to be decided, and that all such cases are omitted cases in the Constitution.

Now, as to the vote of the State of Georgia, I want to say with my friend from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER,] who was asked the question whether he would vote to count the vote of the State of Georgia if it decided a presidential contest—I want to be frank in all my political actions as I have tried to be in all other acts of my life—I believe that, although the law of Congress provides that the votes of the States shall be cast on a certain day, that cannot deprive and it ought not to deprive the people of any State of the choice they have honestly made at the polls.

If the people of Georgia, as I believe they did, honestly went to the polls and voted in November last, and that vote was counted and electors were chosen by a majority of the votes so deposited in the ballot-box, then the electoral vote of Georgia should be counted, and neither this Congress nor any other can afford to throw out the vote of any State upon any such mere technicality. That would make the chaff and the husks that cover the kernel greater than the kernel itself. These are but forms in order to ascertain and declare a given result. The great result was declared by the action of the voters themselves without fraud, and it ought to be counted. And if the vote of Georgia were necessary to be counted in order to decide the contest—if that vote were free from all fraud and we had the power to say whether it should be counted or not—I would vote to count it, though the result might be against my party.

Mr. BICKNELL. I now yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCMAHON.]

Mr. MCMAHON. Mr. Speaker, the resolution now submitted to the House is construed by my distinguished friend from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] as the abandonment of the democratic position on this subject. Allow me to correct him. If the resolution contains anything whatever, it contains the assertion that the two Houses maintain their right to declare what may be counted, or how it may be counted; because it was as competent for them to pass a resolution that the vote of Georgia should or should not be counted as to declare that it should be counted in a particular way. The pending resolution says to the President of the Senate in terms that he has no control over the subject.

It is true that in providing for counting the vote we have failed to provide for other matters that are contained in the Morgan resolution. Why? Because they were unnecessary. Because the pressing business in hand is the declaration of the election of a President of the United States.

We all agree that one man has been elected. We desire to do no more than to settle the one proposition in this House, as it has been settled in the other, which necessarily protruded itself. We have for the present abandoned, as not a practical question at this time, the proposition whether the vote of a State may be rejected by the vote of one House or only upon the concurrent vote of two Houses. That is a question which is left open for the future. Whether the vote of the State of Georgia shall be counted or not, by reason of a failure to vote on the day fixed by law, is a question of no concern in this particular instance, however important as an abstract question, because either way the result will not be changed. Therefore we do not pass upon the question definitely. I am happy to see my friends on the other side so magnanimous as they now seem to be toward the State of Georgia, when her vote makes no difference in the result. We all smile on this side when we think of the situation in case Georgia's vote would have elected General Hancock. I am glad to hear those gentlemen say that the vote of the people as cast upon election day should prevail without reference to subsequent proceedings. But I remember four years ago when the sun went down on election day a majority of the people in Louisiana and Florida had voted for Samuel J. Tilden for President; and we thought then the election was settled. But when that vote had passed through the machinery of a returning board, the result turned out to be different. The certificates of the governors of those States were against us. We then thought we would look to the certificates of the other governors. When they came in we were not only deprived of the votes of the States of Florida and Louisiana, where the vote of the people had been for us, but we received no benefit from the certificate of the governor of Oregon, where the vote of the people had been against us. Thus in the State of Oregon the vote of the people prevailed, but in the States of Louisiana and Florida it did not. Only republicans can produce such glaring inconsistencies.

Mr. ROBESON. Was not the vote of the State of Oregon counted by the unanimous action of the electoral commission, including democrats and republicans alike?

Mr. MCMAHON. According to the original intention of the Constitution of our Government the election of President was not intended to be decided when the voters cast their votes for electors. The electors, it was supposed, would be chosen without any pledge to vote for any particular candidate. Indeed the idea of such pledge was distinctly repudiated. The presidential election, under that theory, did not take place upon the day when the people voted. But according to our modern practice every elector is chosen under a supposed pledge to vote for a particular person. Yet in 1876 neither the vote of the people as cast on election day nor the vote of the electors as certified by the governors of the respective States decided the presidential election; but that question was settled by some other power. A count intervened; and the declaration was made pursuant to the count and not the vote. Without expressing now any opinion upon this question, it seems, according to some of the precedents of the past, never to be determined who has been elected President until the two Houses have made the final declaration. That question, however, we now remit to the future. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Let me suggest to gentlemen: Suppose the electors meet and decline to vote, or vote for another person. Are they prepared to say, under the Constitution as it now stands, that such action may be reversed by an appeal to the actual vote of the people? If so, by whom?

But we will pass over all these questions. The claim that the President of the Senate has any right to count the votes in the sense of settling any disputed question, is a heresy which is to-day stamped out forever, I think, by the action of the Senate, and our probable action to-day, not only in the passage of this resolution, but of an additional one declaring the intent and meaning of the one under consideration. It is thus made apparent that this one question is to be regarded as settled in our future politics now and forever. I want to say in the hearing of gentlemen on either side, (and if I misstate the position of any gentleman within the sound of my voice I hope he will take the liberty to interrupt me and make the necessary correction,)—I believe I speak also for the independent men from Georgia who have spoken on this occasion, (if I do not express their view I hope they will interrupt me,)—I think I speak the voice of the majority on this floor, certainly of every man on this side of the House, when I say that whatever may have been their views about the Morgan resolution, they are united upon the proposition that the President of the Senate has no right to count the votes for President and Vice-President; and with this declaration of the majority of both Houses, I hope this heresy is buried now and forever.

Mr. ROBESON. Before the gentleman takes his seat will he allow me one minute?

Mr. MCMAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBESON. I have called for a division of this question because the first resolution commits nobody on principle——

Mr. MCMAHON. I yielded to the gentleman for a question only.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman yielded to me one minute.

Mr. MCMAHON. For a question.

Mr. ROBESON. Very well. I have called for a division because the second proposition, although in terms it implies what the gentleman says, is an old proposition which has been upon the records of the country's history for more than thirty years, and has been held to bind nobody. If it were a new proposition, I might oppose some of its words and some of its inferences; but as it is old, I am willing to let it pass with the simple record of my opinion against it.

Mr. MCMAHON. The gentleman certainly has not asked me any question. I want to say to the gentleman that there is no precedent upon record where the Vice-President of the United States has declared a man elected except as the mere organ of the two Houses. On the contrary, these old precedents, which the gentleman says settle nothing, settle what we settle here to-day; and that is that the Vice-President has not that right. And we shall vote upon this resolution intelligently, as the division called for will enable gentlemen to vote upon the second section by itself. It contains, as I have said, an absolute negation of the right of the Vice-President. Hence, many gentlemen on the other side will vote against it.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman does not expect me to answer?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BICKNELL. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Two minutes.

Mr. BICKNELL. I yield for one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE.]

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I have only one word to say. The first resolution I accede to because it follows the precedents adopted by the Government of the United States from the beginning of the Government down to the year 1865.

The second branch I object to for two reasons. First, I do not believe the will of a State should be overthrown on a technicality, but that the vote of Georgia should be counted if that vote were properly cast. My second reason for objecting to it is that the second branch of the proposition implies the right of the two Houses to consider whether or not the vote of Georgia shall or shall not be counted. I dissent from that right on the part of the two Houses and aver that the right under existing laws and under the Constitution resides in the Vice-President of the United States, in the President of the Senate, and that no action on the part of Congress can take from him that right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BAYNE. I should like to have a minute more.

A MEMBER. Print.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire leave to print?

Mr. BAYNE. No, sir; I do not desire to print. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Somebody suggested to print and the Chair supposed it was the gentleman's request.

Mr. BAYNE. No, sir.

Mr. BICKNELL. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered.

Mr. BICKNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBESON. I demand a separate vote on each branch of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. A division being demanded the vote will first be on the first branch of the resolution which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

First. That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 9th of February, 1881, at twelve o'clock meridian, pursuant to the requirement of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that two persons shall be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States; and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the journals of the two Houses.

Mr. O'NEILL. I should like to have the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. ROBESON. Not on this branch?

Mr. O'NEILL. No; not on this branch.

The first branch of the resolution was agreed to.

The question recurred on the second branch, as follows:

Second. That if it shall appear that any votes of electors for President or Vice-President of the United States has been given on a day other than that fixed for casting such votes by act of Congress, in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, if the counting, or omitting to count, such votes shall not essentially change the result of the election, they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of electors cast on the —— day of ——, 1880, to be counted, the result would be for A B for President of the United States —— votes, and for C D for President of the United States —— votes; if not counted, the result would be for A B for President of the United States —— votes, and for C D for President of the United States —— votes; but in either event —— is elected President of the United States. And in the same manner for Vice-President.

Mr. CONGER and Mr. O'NEILL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 160, nays 77, not voting 55; as follows:

YEAS—160.

So the second branch of the resolution was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, said: My colleague, Mr. BARBER, is detained at his room on account of illness. I endeavored to obtain a pair for him, but have not succeeded.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I am paired with Mr. KETCHAM; if not, I should have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. SCALES. I am paired with Mr. ERRETT except when necessary to make a quorum. As this does not seem to be a political question, I have voted.

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. ERRETT with Mr. SCALES, until Monday next.

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia, with Mr. WILBER, on political questions.

Mr. STEVENSON with Mr. MITCHELL. If Mr. MITCHELL were present, Mr. STEVENSON would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. RICHMOND with Mr. JORGENSEN, on political questions, after Saturday, the 5th instant, till further notice.

Mr. BLISS with Mr. CLAFLIN.

Mr. BINGHAM with Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.

Mr. HURD with Mr. BUTTERWORTH.

Mr. HERNDON with Mr. SAPP.

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. KETCHAM.

Mr. JAMES with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. CASWELL with Mr. BACHMAN, on political questions.

Mr. MCCOOK with Mr. MULLER, on political questions.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, with Mr. MILES.

Mr. OVERTON with Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee.

Mr. ROSS with Mr. RUSSELL of Massachusetts.

Mr. HAMMOND, of New York, absent on account of sickness, with Mr. SMITH, of New Jersey.

Mr. SPARKS. I sent a written notice of a pair on yesterday which has not been read.

The SPEAKER. If it refers to the present vote it will be read.

Mr. SPARKS. On yesterday I sent a continuous pair for a certain time. I desire to state that I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. WHITE.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BICKNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, before leaving this subject, I desire to do what I have seldom or never done since I have been a member of this House, and that is, as I had no opportunity to discuss the question presented by this concurrent resolution, I ask leave to print some remarks in connection with it.

There was no objection. [See Appendix.]

ARCTIC EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage Senate bill No. 2131, providing for a search for the missing steamer Jeannette of the arctic exploring expedition.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 2131) appropriating money, to be used under the direction of the Navy Department, to prosecute a search for the steamer Jeannette of the arctic exploring expedition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. The bill will go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration.

Mr. KEIFER. Why not put it upon its passage at once?

The SPEAKER. It might be done by consent.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Then I ask unanimous consent to put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the bill will be read, after which the Chair will again ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $175,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be applied under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy to the immediate charter or purchase, equipment, and supply of a vessel in the prosecution of a search for the steamer Jeannette, of the arctic exploring expedition, and such other vessels as may be found to need assistance during said cruise.

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order that this bill, which makes an appropriation, originated in the Senate instead of in the House where it should have originated.

The SPEAKER. The bill is now before the House by unanimous consent, and the Chair inclines to think it is too late to make objection to its consideration.

Mr. MILLS. The point of order I make is that the bill under the Constitution should have originated in the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. In view of the fact that unanimous consent was given for the present consideration of the bill, the Chair inclines to think the objection too late.

Mr. MILLS. The bill has just been read. I could not have objected sooner.

Mr. CHALMERS. The gentleman should have made objection before consent was given to the consideration of the bill and before it was read.

Mr. MILLS. I could not tell what the bill contained or know that it made an appropriation until after the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill discloses the fact that it makes an appropriation, but the Chair will not in haste take advantage.

Mr. KEIFER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I trust my friend from Texas will withhold his objection just at this time. Every motive of humanity should prompt us to pass this at once. The lives of our seamen and the crew of that vessel are imperiled, and steps should promptly be taken to liberate them if they can be found. I hope, therefore, he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. MILLS. If this matter was so urgent, why did not the House originate it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Tennessee to make the motion because of the fact that the subject relates to the lives of American seamen and citizens now in jeopardy, and prompt action, the Chair thinks, should be taken.

Mr. MILLS. What did the Chair do with my point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not made any decision on the point of order made by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I sympathize most heartily with the object of this bill. I am as much in sympathy with suffering humanity as my colleague from Tennessee can possibly be. But there is another and an important question involved in this, one that may establish a dangerous precedent as to the right of the Senate to originate appropriation bills. I believe, sir, that no more important question can present itself for our consideration. I believe that this right, existing in the popular branch of our system of government, is the foundation and bulwark of our civil liberty. Break down that barrier, and you destroy the bulwark of civil liberty in this country. I believe there is no more centralizing doctrine that the enemies of free government could advance than the claim that the Senate shall exercise this right. It is at war with the whole history of constitutional government in this country and of civil liberty everywhere. I object to establishing such a precedent here. I hope the bill will be allowed to take the usual course.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that he has allowed this bill to be presented here for reasons of humanity. He is unwilling to make a decision upon this point, for the reason that the same point has been made upon another bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and the Chair is advised that they have fully considered the questions involved and have prepared a report——

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. They have already made a report.

The SPEAKER. They have reported, and the report has been recommitted for review, or with the intention of bringing it up on a question of privilege.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I was just going to state that this is a question in which I sympathize with my colleague from Tennessee, and also with the gentleman from Texas, who makes the point of order. I agree with them. It is an important question, a judicial question, a constitutional question, which has been referred to the Judiciary Committee, which has undergone their consideration, which has been reported upon and the report recommitted, and which will come before the House in an appropriate manner to be determined. Now, sir, in view of all the facts and circumstances concerning this question, I trust my friend from Texas [Mr. MILLS] and my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] will waive pressing the question of order. And besides, I consider they are rather late in making the suggestion.

Mr. ATKINS. I could not consent, so far as I am concerned, because it would be giving away the position taken by this House. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I submit it is not a parliamentary question to be addressed to the Chair for his decision, whether any bill is or is not unconstitutional, and therefore to be suppressed by the Speaker as out of order. That is a question to be addressed to the House. We must decide whether a bill before us is constitutional or not. The only question in regard to a bill to be submitted to the Chair is whether or not it is in order under our rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] now states that he objects to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is another question.

The SPEAKER. That is done under the rule, and the gentleman from Tennessee, the Chair supposes, takes the same ground as the gentleman from Texas, that he could not exercise his right to object until he knew what was in the body of the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I might reply to my colleague, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] who, I believe, sympathizes with me in principle on this question, that the Committee on Appropriations could prepare a bill, as far as that is concerned, for this purpose, and send it to the Senate, and it would become a law just as soon as this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the bill had better be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ATKINS. I think it should take that course.

Mr. McLANE. I desire to have the rule read to which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] refers.

The SPEAKER. What is asked in this case is unanimous consent to take up the bill for consideration out of the order provided by the rules.

Mr. ATKINS. My point is that this bill is in violation of the order prescribed by the Constitution of the country for the origination of bills.

Mr. McLANE. I do not agree with the gentleman as to that.

Mr. ATKINS. You cannot by any possibility dissever a revenue bill from an appropriation bill.

Mr. McLANE. A revenue bill and an appropriation bill are not one and the same thing. I think the Senate has a perfect right to originate that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not attempted to decide, in view of the question being before the House for its determination, on a report from the Judiciary Committee, as to the constitutional right of the Senate to originate such a bill, no matter what his own individual judgment and opinion may be thereon. But the Chair does recognize the right of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to raise the question against its consideration, unanimous consent being required, the gentleman from Tennessee stating that he availed himself of the opportunity, when presented after the reading of the bill, to make objection to unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Why not vote upon the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER. Because to consider the bill requires unanimous consent, and the gentleman from Tennessee practically objects, which he has right and privilege to do under the rules of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. Would it be in order to move now to take up the apportionment bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] for that purpose.

Mr. ATKINS. I think we will get through with the appropriation bill more quickly if we get this bill disposed of in the first instance.

Mr. COX. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The question being taken the morning hour was dispensed with, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof.)

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. COX. I must insist on the regular order.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. No. 7026) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census. The gentleman from New York in charge of the bill will please indicate who desires the floor at this time.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COLERICK] was on the floor when the House adjourned pending the consideration of this bill. He had yielded half of his time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RYON.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COLERICK] has thirty minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire at this time to ask the gentleman from New York how long this debate is to go on?

Mr. COX. In answer to the gentleman's inquiry, I will say Monday is given away to the District of Columbia Committee——

A MEMBER. Not next Monday.

Mr. COX. Well, Monday is suspension day and will be otherwise occupied. Wednesday is the day for the electoral count. On Tuesday, as I understand, the Appropriations Committee desire the legislative appropriation bill to be taken up. In order, therefore, to have a vote on this bill, I propose to call the previous question on it about five o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Say four o'clock.

Mr. COX. And I will say that I will agree to divide the hour to which I will be entitled as chairman of the committee to gentlemen on both sides fairly, for amendments and for speaking.

Mr. ATKINS. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that he fix the limit of debate at half past four or four o'clock. I suggest it would be utterly impossible for all the gentlemen who desire to speak on this bill to do so between this and five o'clock. He had therefore better fix it at four o'clock. When so many have to be denied, two or three more may as well be denied. Let an opportunity be then afforded for offering an amendment, and let the vote be taken some day next week.

The gentleman from New Hampshire has intimated to me that he proposes a portion of Tuesday next shall be devoted to the funeral obsequies of his deceased colleague. I shall ask the House to take up the legislative bill during the portion of that day not so occupied. After that we will not be able to proceed with the legislative bill before Thursday, at best. I hope, therefore, the debate on the apportionment bill will be concluded to-day, and all the amendments offered so that the vote may be taken some day early next week, that we may then proceed without interruption with the appropriation bills.

Mr. CALKINS. There are many gentlemen on this side of the House, or some at least, who desire to discuss this question. I desire to say that it will, in my opinion, not advance the bill, nor will it be very likely to facilitate action upon it should the previous question be called at the hour suggested by the gentleman from New York. I hope that debate on this bill may be extended for such time as will allow members to be heard upon it. For my part, I am utterly opposed to having the previous question called to-day at all.

Mr. FINLEY. I want to say to the gentleman from New York that there are three or four members of the Select Committee on the Census who have not yet had an opportunity to speak upon this measure. Instead of now fixing the time at which the previous question shall be called, I suggest to the gentleman that the debate be permitted to continue until five or half past five o'clock this evening, and if the House is then in a temper to have the previous question ordered it will be time enough to call it then.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This discussion is entirely by unanimous consent.

Mr. COX. I will let the debate run on until the temper of the House can be ascertained upon the subject of calling the previous question.

Mr. FINLEY. That is better.

Mr. CONGER. I desire the gentleman to consent that amendments may be offered and voted upon.

Mr. COX. I do not desire to shut out any amendments.

Mr. CONGER. Let amendments be offered and voted upon before the previous question is called.

Mr. COX. I apprehend there will be no difficulty on that point. I have no desire to cut off any amendment, and if there was time I would not shut out any debate.

Mr. CONGER. When general debate is closed the five-minute rule might be applied to amendments.

Mr. COX. We can arrange that by consent.

Mr. HOOKER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has not answered my question, whether he is going to insist upon a vote to-day.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COLERICK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COLERICK addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. DAGGETT. I take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall take but a few minutes of the hour which my friend from Nevada has so kindly given me. I fear the House is not deeply interested in any further detailed discussion of this bill; but there are one or two matters which I wish to lay before it by way of suggestion. The number of Representatives is already considerably large, and I am individually of the opinion it is large enough. But I do not quite agree with those gentlemen who find fault with its size and desire a reduction. There is an advantage in a large House, and as that is a relative term, I would say a large House of three hundred members. There is a greater variety of talent in it. There are more men to be found capable of being profitably devoted to specialties. There is a large aggregate mass of intelligence. On every subject of legislation there will be some men found well informed. It is a larger jury, not bound as the ordinary jury to absolute unanimity, but on the whole, after fair argument, coming to just decisions.

There is safety up to certain limits in the multitude of counselors, in the multitude of jurors. Again, a House of good size is less liable to corrupting influences; less liable to the undue influence of corporations or special interests.

I do not criticise unfavorably, but we in Connecticut, with a lower house of some two hundred and fifty members, have, in my judgment, a decided advantage over the Empire State with one hundred and twenty-eight members in its lower house. I am quite sure I would rather trust the majority of questions coming up to modern legislative bodies, the questions coming now before them for consideration, to a large body coming directly from the masses of the people than to a small body. I think we are safer with our two hundred and fifty freemen coming from the masses of our people as judges than that large State with its gigantic pecuniary interests and only one hundred and twenty-eight members. In a district which is limited in extent, where there can be exercised over the Representative that personal power and influence which arise from proximity, which arise from personal acquaintance and neighborhood, that influence is a larger factor in the total than where the constituency is 300,000 or 400,000. With a very large constituency there are comparatively few whom a Representative can call personal friends and neighbors. It is of their good opinion that he will frequently think, and it is their influence that will to a large degree control his actions.

Therefore a reasonably small constituency is an advantage. The House is now, in my judgment, at a proper figure. I would not consent to reduce it very greatly, neither would I willingly consent to a material increase. I am inclined to favor the bill proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] which contemplates fixing the number at three hundred and one members. There are some other objections to an increase that I have not referred to.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, this is the only popular national assembly in the world that permits itself to be encumbered by desks. Certainly the French Assembly does not, neither does the House of Commons permit their use. It is in one sense a great hinderance to the public business as well as an inconvenience of a deliberative body. I suppose, however, that it would be practically impossible to induce this House to abandon the desks; but we could more easily get along with an assembly of five hundred members, if we were to do so, than we can get along with three hundred by retaining them.

But that induces me to consider another point. We have the desks here. Now, the necessity for them results from the fact that in a majority of cases we are overwhelmed with a class of private business that ought never come before this body; and I say to the younger men who may hope to have many years of public life before them, that the greatest reform to come into the National Congress is the unloading of this illimitable mass of private business. We are, sir, the only deliberative assembly in the world of any magnitude that permits this—that makes this a justice's court, so to speak—the only one. I have in my desk here an "order of business" of the House of Commons. There is no such private calendar upon that as we have in ours. There is nothing of the kind in the French Assembly. This private business consumes the larger part of our time. It is not only an incumbrance to public business, but it is a shame that Congress should permit it. A fraction only of the claims presented get through. I believe that nine-tenths of them are perhaps founded in justice; but no matter whether they are or not, I suppose the parties who present them believe them to be just, or they would not haunt the Halls of Congress year after year, and they are entitled to a hearing and a decision somewhere. I believe also that the great majority of the private claims that pass through the House are correct and just, but they constitute a very small fraction of the mass that are presented; claims that we do not see; claims that after having been for years and years thrust upon the committees of the House are abandoned, heard of no more, the claimants giving them up in utter despair. It is a moderate calculation that the consideration of these claims takes up one-half of the time of the House.

We devote one day to the consideration of nominally private claims, which is practically about one-fifth of the time of the House, but they are brought before us in one way or another from all committees during every legislative session. It would, perhaps, be speaking within bounds to say that when one-half of our time, in session, in committee, and in our correspondence, is consumed by matters that should never come before us at all, there is a great reform to be reached in this direction. I see no reason why this Government, as it chooses its own judges, as it appoints its own attorneys, should not open its courts to the great masses of these private claimants and give these citizens such an opportunity for a fair hearing as they can never have before Congress. There might be a broad but judicious enactment to refer such demands to several tribunals like the Court of Claims, or to some special officers with duties similar to those of masters in chancery, to examine and audit and report them to Congress for appropriations. And we could from time to time lay down by general laws the limitations and instructions to such courts or officers. In short we could remove this business from these committees and give it to the regularly established courts. The present method is grossly insufficient. The hearing is purely ex parte. A member comes into his committee-room and the chairman gives him a large mass of papers such as he would not as a lawyer undertake to study thoroughly and report upon but for a large fee. He calls no witnesses; he has to proceed on affidavits made up with no opportunity on the part of the Government to cross-question; the evidence is altogether ex parte; he is expected to study it, night after night, and bring in an elaborate report, and, if the sum be at all considerable, he lays himself open, for the slightest negligence or oversight, for which he may not be at all in fault, to be made the subject of national scandal.

All this is wrong. The British Government disposes of the matter otherwise, by a certain petition of right which is referred to the proper tribunals. And that we must and can do. Then we shall be freed from a large share of the correspondence that requires these desks, and from anxieties and labors that render it impossible for members to give due study to great and serious public business.

Then, if you choose, you can enlarge your House; but I do not know if I would do that even under those circumstances. This House, whether it be composed of one hundred or a thousand members, is sitting here in this Hall a unit. That unit has less effective legislative power when you make it a thousand than it has when you make it fifty, because of the multitude of interruptions and appeals and points of order and divisions, &c. Fifty men could work to greater advantage, could get rid of a much greater amount of business than the five hundred under any possible circumstances. We lose in the effectiveness and rapid dispatch of business by large numbers.

As this nation grows in population the number and importance of the claims very greatly increase. But as you enlarge the House the effectiveness of the tribunal that disposes of them is rather diminished. If this is to be merely a court of claims, it would be better if it were composed of nine or fifteen gentlemen, sitting constantly as a court with fifty or sixty others sitting as masters in chancery to take evidence and report. And we shall degenerate into something of that sort. We have done so already to a very large extent. I say "we shall"—no, sir. As time goes on, unless we reform this House, we shall be utterly overwhelmed by this amount of business until national scandals and the voice of the people compel its reform. This is the only Government which permits itself to be tormented in that way.

Now, sir, one other point. The fourteenth amendment, so far as I have been able to observe, does not come into question in this apportionment. That is my individual opinion. I am aware that there are practical evasions of that amendment. I am compelled to believe that in portions of the country men are denied their equal rights largely by reason of race, color, and previous condition of servitude, by reason of accidents of humanity which it is not within their power to overcome. But this denial, so far as I have observed, does not come in the form of any constitutional provision or statute. If so, we should be at liberty and should be bound to take notice of it and reduce the representation of the offending State accordingly. But I believe every constitutional provision or statute on the subject of the suffrage is on the face of it just, or at least apparently impartial, so that there is nothing left for us to do; and the denial of free suffrage and evasion of the Constitution are effected outside of law, by local sentiment and unlawful combinations and processes which it is the duty of the local courts to remedy, which they can and should remedy, and will remedy when the public opinion of the localities shall have become sound. I fear the evils are beyond the reach of congressional action, save so far as they can be reached in the case of individual members or applicants for seats claiming an election in the face of gross frauds and outrages. Then the public sentiment of the nation can be manifested through prompt rebuffs of the unjust claimant until it shall be seen that elections conducted with fraud and violence are useless. Sir, it is the absolute and irrevocable determination of the American people that there shall be a fair, free ballot throughout the country; and those men are the great enemies, the dangerous foes of State rights who, under that pretense, shelter themselves in inflicting wrongs and making exclusions of any character whatever; for the time may come when the great prevailing demand, the great overwhelming sense of justice of the American people will say that if justice cannot be done under these old limitations of State rights, we must break them down and assume for a national government a wider and a greater power. I shall regret to see that day, but it can be made to come by a persistent outrage and denial of justice.

I hold that the regulations, the qualifications required by my State, for example, are not such as to bring it under the fourteenth amendment at all. We exact no qualification of consequence beyond the usual limitations of citizenship and residence except that it is required that the applicant for suffrage shall be able to read. Every man before he is registered and sworn as a voter is required to take the statute-book in his hand at a page which may be opened by any one of the board that admits him and show that he can read from it. And any member of the board—and we have minority representation upon it, so that there are always republican and democratic members on the board of selectmen—any member of the board can take the book and open it at another place, from which the applicant is required to read, in order to detect fraudulent preparations for the test.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. And that is done sometimes by democratic members?

Mr. HAWLEY. There are always republican members and always democratic members on the board; both parties are represented.

Now, I hold that to be a perfectly just and proper requirement in the case of a State that ever since the Rev. Thomas Hooker with his congregation came through the wilderness from Boston and founded the colony of Connecticut, bringing the church and the school with him, has maintained a system of public schools. Such a State has a right to say that a man twenty-one years of age who cannot read ought to have learned to read. And even if he be an adopted citizen, certainly during his five years of probation he could have learned to read if he had common sense and the slightest power of application. With our New England traditions we hold that to be a fair and just requirement.

Of a similar character, so far as the fourteenth amendment is concerned, though to be defended on other grounds—I do not undertake to defend it at all—is the small property qualification in some States, not in mine. That qualification, and the reading qualification, and the one that requires a certain term of residence are all such that a man may overcome them. They are not fatal bars to his right to vote, not imposed by reason of his foreign birth, his race, color, religion, or previous condition of servitude. They are qualifications and limitations applied to all men alike and which any man can himself overcome. Therefore they do not come within the fourteenth amendment.

I have stated that from a large House the States would derive no increase of power. Let me illustrate: In a House of 10,000 members the States would be no better off proportionately than they are now. The delegations of the States would increase in due ratio; the fractions would be finer, it is true; but you can never overcome all fractions until you make a House of more than forty-nine millions of members; that is, until you call every man, woman, and child of this nation to assemble in grand convention.

You cannot escape fractions in any way. The only question is, what is a fair number for this legislative body? What number can you take and what can you fairly give where there are very large fractions? You are not bound to give any for fractions; it is a matter of equity. You may arbitrarily divide the population and leave the matter there, and in a long series of years the injustice to the various States would be equalized. The individual member grows less and less in importance as the body grows larger in numbers. His State has no more power from her increased number of Representatives and he himself has less. The body, the legislative unit itself, becomes less effective, both the body and the individual member, as the number increases. You gain nothing in the average by increasing the whole number. As you run along up the numbers from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and one, three hundred and seven, three hundred and eleven, three hundred and nineteen, three hundred and twenty-five, and three hundred and twenty-nine, there are States all the way up which obtain certain advantages, but they are obtained at the expense of other States.

I care very little whether at a certain station the republicans gain four or the democrats gain four. In the end the gains amount to very little in comparison with the whole, looking over the ten years to come. The gains are small, are temporary, are mere accidents of the elections. The next election may give twenty-five republican majority here (I hope it will give at least fifteen) or it may give a small democratic majority. But in laying down rules for the good of the whole nation I do not care to regard that matter, unless I find a disposition to adopt a particular number for the sake of gaining some advantage of that sort. In that case I might feel driven to meet that disposition with an attempt to adopt another number which would give no State any advantage. For example, between the numbers two hundred and ninety-three and three hundred and eleven I would take three hundred and nine. But I am content to stop at three hundred and one, with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] whom I thank for his statesmanlike speech.

Gentlemen forget sometimes that running along up in the numbers their States lose largely. So long as the number of the Representatives of your State remains fixed you lose power by the increase of the total of the House. Take my own State of Connecticut. Fortunately, in one sense, we retain our four members by a very heavy fraction. There is no change in the representation of Connecticut at any point in raising the total from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and twenty-nine.

I called upon my friend, Mr. Elliott, the statistician of the Treasury Department, to verify and accurately extend certain calculations. I find that as we go from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and twenty-nine, Connecticut loses 10.94, substantially 11, per cent. of her proportionate power, because the total increases while her delegation remains unchanged. I call attention to a table, prepared by Mr. Elliott, which I will print with my remarks, because it may be interesting to some gentlemen. It shows proportionate losses during the successive stages of an increase of the total. We study long in order to ascertain how we may gain a member in this State or that State, forgetting that in order to reach that gain we proportionately rob some other State.

Table showing the States with reference to which the number of Representatives in Congress remains unchanged, while the entire number of Representatives in Congress is increased from one of the smaller to a larger of the following numbers, namely: 293, 301, 307, 311, 319, 325, and 329; also, showing the proportion in which the relative influence or weight of the State in Congress is diminished by such increase in the aggregate number, its own number of Representatives remaining unchanged; and the percentage of loss in each stage.

In going from three hundred and one to three hundred and twenty-nine Alabama loses 8.51 per cent. of her relative power. In going from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and twenty-nine Arkansas would lose 10.94 per cent. of her relative power; that is to say, substantially 11 per cent. In going from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and eleven California would lose 5.79 per cent. of her relative power, and in going from three hundred and nineteen to three hundred and twenty-nine she would lose 3.95 per cent.

Colorado by going from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and twenty-nine loses about 11 per cent. of her relative power, and is in the same category with Connecticut. Delaware is also in the same category. Going from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and seven Florida loses 4.56 per cent., and from three hundred and eleven to three hundred and twenty-nine she loses 5.47 per cent. Georgia loses the same in each case. And there also is the State of Louisiana, which from three hundred and one to three hundred and twenty-nine loses 8.51 per cent. of her proportionate power.

Kansas in going from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and nineteen loses 8.15 per cent.; so that the number had better remain at two hundred and ninety-three, so far as her proportion of power in the Government is concerned. Maine in going from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and twenty-nine loses 10.94. She certainly has no motive to make the House larger unless you run away up to where she would gain another member. Minnesota in going from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and twenty-nine loses 10.94 per cent.; Nebraska the same; Nevada the same; and so of course with most of the small States, but not all. New Jersey going from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and twenty-five loses 9.85.

Mr. COX. Who absorbs what is lost?

Mr. HAWLEY. A few States. I have not taken the trouble to ascertain that. Perhaps the gentleman who proposed the committee's proposition for three hundred and eleven, by which the Southern States gain six, can tell us more about that. I do not know just where the figures of gain are. I am showing that a very large number of States—more than a quarter of this House—lose by an increase. I think there are eighteen States that lose by a growth up to three hundred and twenty-five or three hundred and twenty-nine.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Can the gentleman say it is not fair that those States should lose? Has he gone into that calculation?

Mr. COX. That is a moral question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. No; I am speaking upon the figures.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand the gentleman's point. If you double two hundred and ninety-three, the present number of members, we should all be where we are now, relatively; but I hold that we should have a loss in effectiveness as a legislative body. On the way up from two hundred and ninety-three to twice two hundred and ninety-three there are stations where some States gain and some lose; so that one State would be suited at one station and one at another, and the House is divided into five or six different parties according to the different steps on the way up where it seems particular States would get the advantage at the expense of others. I am showing the advantages and disadvantages at particular figures. These advantages and disadvantages may equalize on the whole; but between two hundred and ninety-three and three hundred and twenty-nine there are at any particular point losses to a very considerable fraction of the States, and some totals are much more unjust than others.

South Carolina on an increase from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and nineteen loses 8.15. Now, take, for example, the State of New York. At three hundred and one, if Mr. Elliott is correct as usual, she would have thirty-one members, or 10⅓ per cent. of the aggregate membership. At a total of three hundred and twenty-five the membership of New York would be thirty-four, making 10.46 per cent. of the aggregate membership. In passing from three hundred and one to three hundred and twenty-five she has a gain on her relative membership of .16 of 1 per cent. of the aggregate, which is a gain of only 1.6 per cent. on her own relative influence. These remarks indicate the general line of the criticisms I have to make on these bills.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman state whether that gain is or is not exactly what New York ought to gain in proportion to her share of the aggregate increase of population throughout the Union?

Mr. HAWLEY. There are stages in this increase that work injustice; there are stages that approximate justice; but, on the whole, there is no place that justifies us in so largely increasing the total membership. The increase in the case of New York runs from 10.3 of the total to 10.45 per cent.—a gain of a little over 1 per cent. of her actual number. At a total of three hundred and twenty-five she just gains her thirty-fourth member, through a fraction of 70,912, while at two hundred and ninety-three she has thirty members, with a resulting fraction of only 28,900 unrepresented. The gain of New York in population is not up to the average of the gain of the whole Union. But I was only showing that New York has no sufficient motive for a large increase of the total representation.

I say for the effectiveness of this House and for the benefit of the power of the several States we ought rather to let the number remain at the reasonable figure of about three hundred and one. As we increase the House we largely detract from its value as a unit; and there is no corresponding advantage. To this I add the suggestion that if this House is not to break down utterly as a national legislative body, it must initiate and put into effect the great reform of providing other and better tribunals for the adjustment of private claims.

I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. ROBINSON. In the portion of the hour remaining to me I may not have time to conclude what I have to say. I hope the House will give me a little more time if I need it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER.) There are thirty-five minutes of the hour remaining.

Mr. ROBINSON: I will not make any extended remarks upon the question of the number of members of this House, because so many gentlemen have already discussed it. I will merely say that I substantially agree with the view of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] that there should be only as little increase above the present number of the House as is absolutely necessary under the circumstances. I will not enlarge upon that topic.

I hold that the Congress of the United States should proceed to make this apportionment of Representatives among the several States of this Union, without regard to sectionalism, without regard to party. For myself (and I speak for none other) I do not care to stop to inquire whether a certain number will give the East more than the West, or the South more than the West, because I say that the apportionment should be made among the several States according to their respective numbers. This is a nation of the States and of the people in the States; and if prosperity has gone over this country, beginning on the narrow fringe of the Atlantic shore, increasing our population from 3,000,000 to 50,000,000 in the first century of our existence, and if that population has clustered in the West and is now gathering in the South, we ought not to refuse on any narrow principle to accord to the increasing and increased communities the representation that is their right under the Constitution.

But I desire to submit some considerations upon the statements and arguments that have been made with reference to the construction of the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution. The second section of that article provides:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Representatives shall be apportioned according to number; not according to voters; not according to anything but numbers—nothing is plainer—not taking into account voters who may for any cause remain away from the polls.

When was this amendment adopted, and why? The Constitution and its first twelve amendments were passed and adopted long before the war. The war grew out of slavery and the complications of that institution. Slavery went down and the Union wrote in its great charter the thirteenth amendment, that thereafter neither slavery nor involuntary servitude should exist in the United States. The black man was a free man, and yet that was not deemed enough for his protection. It was feared that in the Southern States which had lately been in rebellion there would be measures adopted which would deprive the black man of his equal rights under the law. The House will bear in mind at that time the process of reconstruction was under consideration, and the determination of the grounds upon which the different States lately in rebellion should be admitted to representation in the Congress of the United States, and hence to a full restoration to their former place in the Federal Union. To prevent a denial of the rights of the black man, the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution was adopted. States were waiting to find restoration to the Union. Read the history on every page and you will find confirmation of this view that I give you. Read the debates in the two branches of Congress on the consideration of this proposition to amend the Constitution, and you find but one idea pervading the whole. Why, the resolution of the Thirty-ninth Congress that inaugurated the fourteenth amendment was this:

That a joint committee of fifteen members shall be appointed, nine of whom shall be members of the House and six members of the Senate, who shall inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called Confederate States of America, and report whether they, or any of them, are entitled to be represented in either House of Congress.

What did that joint committee report? This, as an amendment to the Constitution:

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

That was the proposition as first introduced into Congress from this joint committee of fifteen. Does it aim at anything except the one idea that has been stated?

In the course of the discussion Senator Henderson, of Missouri, offered the following substitute:

No State, in prescribing the qualifications requisite for electors therein, shall discriminate against any person on account of color or race.

The Senate did not adopt that substitute, and Senator Henderson said to them within five years that would be written into the Constitution of the United States; the country will not remain with this bare statement that is proposed as the fourteenth article of amendment.

In the House of Representatives it passed as recommended by the committee without amendment; but in the Senate, after a long discussion, in which the most noted Senators of that time took part—Senators Fessenden, Sumner, Wilson, Howard, Reverdy Johnson, and others—this whole matter went through a most exhaustive and able discussion. Read it all and you will not find any ground to believe that the wise statesmen of that time were doing anything by that amendment except to provide for the protection of suffrage and other rights of the black man.

But the history of the time that immediately followed proves all that. Following the adoption of the fourteenth article of amendment in the two Houses of Congress, the desire was that that amendment should be ratified in the States. The lately rebellious States were waiting to be received into the Union again and admitted to representation in Congress. The purpose of Congress was to present to them this fourteenth article of amendment and say by the adoption of that amendment to the Constitution of the United States, or expressing ratification of it on their part, we will consent to your representation in Congress. The States then had prepared and adopted on their own part constitutions for their respective States which they were ready then to submit to Congress. Congress had received these constitutions, had considered them and said they were satisfactory provided that these States shall at the same time accept the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution.

Now turn to one of the reconstruction acts, and as significant in comment on the history of this time all this legislation by bill, report, and argument is called the reconstruction legislation of the time. Reconstruction of what? Of the States that had never wanted or needed reconstruction? No, indeed. But of the States that had attempted to get out of the Union and were in such condition that neither they nor the rest of the Union knew where they were.

Look at the reconstruction act passed to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida on the 25th of June, 1868:

Whereas the people of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida have, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, framed constitutions of State government which are republican, and have adopted such constitutions by large majorities of the votes cast at the election held for the ratification or the rejection of the same: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That each of the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida shall be entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as a State of the Union when the Legislature of said State shall have duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-ninth Congress, and known as article 14, upon the following fundamental conditions: that the constitution of neither of said States shall ever be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote in said State who are entitled to vote by the constitution thereof, except as punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted, under laws equally applicable to all the inhabitants of said State.

This bill passed the Senate—yeas 31, nays 5; and the House—yeas 110, nays 35. It was vetoed by President Johnson, and passed over the veto.

Now let us look at the constitutions of these States that came under that amendment and that were pronounced republican.

The constitution of North Carolina required that the male person entitled to vote shall be twenty-one years of age and a citizen; that he shall have resided in that State for twelve months next preceding the election, and for thirty days in the county in which he offered to vote, and that he should take a certain oath therein prescribed.

The constitution of South Carolina provided that the male citizen offering to vote shall have been a resident of the State at the time of the adoption of this constitution, and that he shall have resided therein for one year, and in the county in which he offers to vote for sixty days.

The constitution of Louisiana provides that all male persons twenty-one years of age and upward, already naturalized in the United States, resident of this State for one year next preceding the election, and not less than ten days within the parish in which he offers to vote, except those disfranchised under this constitution and persons under interdiction.

That is the constitution of Louisiana at the present day. Persons under interdiction are persons under prohibition, known technically as persons that are denied their rights otherwise given them, denied by the probate court of the State. In other words, the probate court of the State of Louisiana exercises the power of determining that a man is insane—non compos mentis—and not a proper person to have the management of his property, and excluding persons that are in terms excluded in many other constitutions.

The constitution of Georgia, the Empire State of the South, I heard to-day, provides twenty-one years of age; shall have resided in the State six months; shall have resided thirty days in the county, and shall have paid all taxes required which he may have had the opportunity of paying agreeably to the law for the year next preceding the election.

I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, "opportunity" to have such narrow meaning as ability to pay——

Mr. COOK. Will the gentleman permit me to explain that provision of the constitution?

Mr. ROBINSON. I presume that there is no difference between us as to the terms of the constitution.

Mr. COOK. I wish to state that our taxes become delinquent at the end of the year. For instance, the tax due in 1881 becomes delinquent if not paid until the end of the year. The taxes for 1880 must have been paid to entitle the person to vote. If a pauper, he pays no tax. If sixty years of age, he does not pay a poll tax. The poll tax goes into the school fund, and that has been the case in our State for many years.

Mr. ROBINSON. The State of Alabama required that the voter should reside in the State for six months, and for three months in the county; and certain provisions were made for soldiers, sailors, marines, &c.

Florida, and I ask the gentlemen here to take due notice of this.

Mr. LOWE. I would like to interrupt the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I beg the gentleman not to interrupt me, unless he wishes to correct a statement. If I have made an erroneous statement I shall be very glad to be interrupted.

Mr. LOWE. Alabama prohibits any property or educational qualification whatever; that is under the democratic constitution of the State, which is the only true democratic constitution that any State possesses. We have the best constitution and the worst election laws of any State in the Union.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am only speaking now of the requirements of the constitution at the time that the reconstruction measures were proposed, and I have stated Alabama correctly, as I understand it. If I have not stated it correctly, as it was at that time, then I shall be glad if the gentleman will correct me.

Florida, to which I was about to refer, required a residence there of one year in the State, and six months in the county, &c., and this, further, I find under that constitution that was declared to be republican in form, and satisfactory at that time to be accepted by the Congress of the United States. I read this clause:

The Legislature shall enact laws requiring educational qualifications for electors after the year 1880; but no such laws shall be made applicable to any elector who may have registered or voted at any elections previous thereto.

Think you, Mr. Speaker, the then Congress of the United States believed that the fourteenth article of the amendment they presented to the State of Florida was violated when they declared to that State that constitution you bring here is republican in form, and we say you may come and be represented in Congress if you will adopt that fourteenth amendment? Think you Congress believed that when it was written in the constitution of the State of Florida that she should enact laws in 1880 prescribing educational qualifications, thereby the fourteenth amendment was to be violated? And the fact is that in the Legislature now sitting in Florida a bill has been introduced to give force and effect to that provision——

Mr. DAVIDSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. I prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I wish simply to ask you what party adopted that constitution?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to talk about party in this connection. I was in hopes that in this discussion we would be able to rise above the questions of party. If there is any gentleman here that will not hear me unless I talk about party, then I will prefer that he should not listen. If gentlemen upon this floor desire me not to proceed unless I enter into the arena of party politics, then I will cease. I only want to talk about the substance of this matter.

Then, at that time that this amendment was adopted, if you will examine the reconstruction acts applying to other States, I suppose you will find the same thing or the same provisions in other constitutions, to which I have already referred in the constitution of these States.

But at that time, with those different States presenting constitutions having these qualifications expressed, or these discriminations, if you use that word, or these prerequisites, presenting them in a Congress that was made up of the representatives of the other States in this country, and all of them without exception having various prerequisites in their own constitutions, that fourteenth amendment was adopted, it cannot be claimed for one minute that there was any other view than as stated, that it was for the protection of the black man in the lately rebellious States. Then came the statutes.

Mr. LOWE. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Not at present. I will say that I do not like to be discourteous, of course, and if I yield to questions on all sides my time will be all gone, and the House will weary with me certainly; but if the House will give me time I will submit to all the questions that may be asked, and will answer as many as I can, and what I cannot answer I will say are beyond my comprehension.

I said that certain statutes were adopted by Congress following the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, and they are now found in sections under title 26 of the Revised Statutes. Read section 2004, which provides that—

All citizens of the United States who are otherwise qualified by law to vote at any election by the people in any State, Territory, district, county, city, parish, township, school district, municipality, or other territorial subdivision, shall be entitled and allowed to vote at all such elections without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; any constitution, law, custom, usage, or regulation of any State or Territory, or by or under its authority, to the contrary notwithstanding.

That seems to assume that the States could make certain constitutional provisions or provisions by law in regard to the qualifications of suffrage. Then again section 2005, section 2006, and section 2007 all refer to certain prerequisites to the exercise of the right of suffrage; and they go to this extent, gentlemen will remember, that they provide that when, under the laws of a State, certain prerequisites are declared or required, if a person offers to perform them and the officer before whom that performance should be made refuses to allow him to perform them, then he shall have the full benefit of his proffer, and shall be just as much entitled to vote as if he had performed.

Now, certainly, that could not apply, unless there were certain prerequisites set up in the States under the constitution and laws of those States. Well, we have had adjudications on this point. In the sixteenth Wallace, the twenty-first Wallace, the ninety-second of the United States Reports, and in the recent volume, the one hundredth of the United States Reports, we have had the expression of the Supreme Court of the United States, clearly and unmistakably, that the fourteenth amendment was adopted for the purpose of protecting the rights of the black man. I will not take the time of the House to read all of these. I have simply named them. Gentlemen will find them for themselves; but I will read from the case of Strauder vs. West Virginia, decided in 1879, in which the court say of the fourteenth amendment:

This is one of a series of constitutional provisions having a common purpose, namely, securing to a race recently emancipated, a race that through many generations had been held in slavery, all the civil rights that the superior race enjoy. The true spirit and meaning of the amendments, as we said in the Slaughter-House cases, (16 Wall., 36,) cannot be understood without keeping in view the history of the times when they were adopted and the general objects they plainly sought to accomplish. At the time when they were incorporated into the Constitution it required little knowledge of human nature to anticipate that those who had long been regarded as an inferior and subject race would, when suddenly raised to the rank of citizenship, be looked upon with jealousy and positive dislike, and that State laws might be enacted or enforced to perpetuate the distinctions that had before existed. Discriminations against them had been habitual. It was well known that in some States laws making such discriminations then existed, and others might well be expected. The colored race, as a race, was abject and ignorant, and in that condition was unfitted to command the respect of those who had superior intelligence. Their training had left them mere children, and as such they needed the protection which a wise government extends to those who are unable to protect themselves. They especially needed protection against unfriendly action in the States where they were resident. It was in view of these considerations the fourteenth amendment was framed and adopted. It was designed to assure to the colored race the enjoyment of all the civil rights that under the law are enjoyed by white persons, and to give to that race the protection of the General Government in that enjoyment whenever it should be denied by the States. It not only gave citizenship and the privileges of citizenship to persons of color, but it denied to any State the power to withhold from them the equal protection of the laws, and authorized Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. To quote the language used by us in the Slaughter-House cases: "No one can fail to be impressed with the one pervading purpose found in all the amendments lying at the foundation of each, and without which none of them would have been suggested—we mean the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly-made freeman and citizen from the oppressions of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over them." So again: "The existence of laws in the States where the newly emancipated negroes resided, which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied, and by it (the fourteenth amendment) such laws were forbidden. If, however, the States did not conform their laws to its requirements, then by the fifth section of the article of amendment Congress was authorized to enforce it by suitable legislation." And it was added: "We doubt very much whether any action of a State, not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class, will ever be held to come within the purview of this provision."

So stood the fourteenth amendment, adopted under the circumstances that have been stated. And yet, in less than the five years, as Senator Henderson predicted, the Congress of the United States presented the fifteenth amendment that was ratified in due form and is now a part as much as any of the great charter of the liberties of the American freemen:

The right of the citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

What I say is, the fifteenth amendment supersedes, overruns the provisions substantially of the fourteenth amendment. It is broader. The fourteenth amendment tolerated the idea that a State could deprive the black man of the right to vote if the State was only willing to have its representation reduced. But the Congress saw that that was not safe. Congress said the black man shall have the right to vote, and it shall be protected to him in the Constitution of the United States. We will not leave it to any temporary expedient of party control, it may be, in the Houses of Congress; but we will write it down permanently in the Constitution.

And so I say that there it stands now as the final declaration, and it is not in the power of any State to deny or abridge the right to vote to any person because of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The Constitution of the United States and the laws in pursuance thereof are the supreme law of the land, and an attempted enactment of any State in violation of it would, in my humble opinion, be as void as the blank paper upon which it may be written, powerless, utterly so.

What would be the remedy provided under the second article? Congress may enforce it by appropriate legislation. I pass beyond that because that is not material to the present discussion. If gentlemen will consult the case United States vs. Reese, 92 United States Reports, they will find a confirmation of this view in regard to the fifteenth amendment.

When did the House of Representatives, when did Congress next consider this question? When the apportionment act under which we now hold our seats was before Congress in 1872 these same questions were then exhaustively considered by many gentlemen. I commend to the study of any one interested in the subject the very able argument presented by the late Speaker of this House, now deceased, the honorable Mr. Kerr, of Indiana, in which he declared that the
